

venerable House Ways and Means Committee, I am not just paying tribute to a great legislator from the neighboring State of Rhode Island nor a great representative for New England on that important committee. In rising to pay tribute to former Representative Aime J. Forand I am rising to pay tribute to a great American, a man who has left his indelible imprint on the legislative history of this country, in the area where it probably matters most, in the annals of social legislation.

It is not all that uncommon in Congress for a Congressman to become closely identified with a particular bill and to the extent that he works at it and pushes for it, the man and the bill become inseparable and inextricably linked as one. This happens quite frequently to no one's great surprise in a body such as this. Such was the case with Aime Forand. Only in his case, because of his foresight and singular persistence, one of the great landmark bills passed into law and has become part of our national scene today.

I am referring, of course, to medicare and its father, Aime Forand. In fact, when medicare legislation became law in 1965, Congressman Forand was already retired 5 years from this House. Yet so hard and so long had he fought for the concept behind such legislation that there was no doubt in anyone's mind as to whom the victory belonged that day. All thoughts were with our former colleague. His crusade, and that is what it was, was not an easy one. He ran headlong into some of the fiercest opposition any legislative proposal has ever encountered. And yet the Congressman persisted, taking comfort in the knowledge that millions of senior citizens, a novel concept at that time, were behind him and were counting on him to help them meet one of old age's greatest problems, adequate health care and insurance.

In his retirement, he was not inactive. As national chairman of the National Council of Senior Citizens for Health Care Through Social Security, he was in fact very much in the battle. In some senses, more involved in the struggle for medicare than when he was in Congress, free from the details and other concerns of representing a congressional district, Aime Forand could devote his full attention and energy to what by then had become uppermost in the minds of himself and the senior citizens of the Nation.

In a real sense, Aime Forand came well-equipped to do the job. His whole life was the story of a self-made man. From a large family he was in fact forced to drop out of school at the seventh grade. Why? Because of his father's illness and the staggering burden it placed on the family's limited resources. The rest of his education came the hard way, in between jobs and working and sleeping. Before he came to Washington he had been in administrative positions dealing with the problems of the aged firsthand, which gave him tremendous practical insight into the problems facing the elderly. When he introduced his medicare bill in 1957, he said something which I think would be difficult to surpass, for it's compassion in a nutshell—

The needy will never again be just statistics to anybody who has to deal with their personal problems.

When Congressman Forand retired from Congress in 1960, he had served 24 continuous years. During much of that time, he served with another great congressman, John Fogarty. I do not think I am overstating the facts in saying that at that time it would have been difficult to find another State that had a delegation of higher caliber, of greater dedication to the problems of the sick and the elderly, of greater compassion and with greater respect from their colleagues than the State of Rhode Island. The quality of service of both these congressmen will long serve as an inspiration to students of our Nation's history as a model of what one small state can contribute in talent and human resources to the national leadership at a time when the Nation needed such qualities the most. When he retired from Congress, Aime Forand was the second-ranking Democrat on the House Ways and Means Committee and the acknowledged expert in Congress on legislation affecting the social security system. If any man in recent legislative history was the father of an idea whose time had come, and I am thankful to God Almighty that he was granted the years to see his idea through to fruition, it was our dear departed former colleague, the Honorable Aime J. Forand.

SENATE—Friday, February 4, 1972

The Senate met at 10 a.m. and was called to order by Hon. JAMES B. ALLEN, a Senator from the State of Alabama.

PRAYER

O Lord whose mercies are without end and whose grace is sufficient for all our need, as Thou hast been the guide of past generations be to us our guide in the perilous and demanding days in which we live. Strengthen all who bear the responsibilities of public office in this land. Enlighten them by Thy spirit.

Make us a people strong in character, in virtue and morality, in piety and patriotism, in material and spiritual resources that we may guard faithfully the values entrusted to us, employing our might only for the extension of Thy kingdom and in the service of mankind. Lift our vision to behold the world that is yet to be and hasten the coming of Thy kingdom.

We pray in the Redeemer's name. Amen.

DESIGNATION OF THE ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. ELLENDER).

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., February 4, 1972.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate on official duties, I appoint Hon. JAMES B. ALLEN, a Senator from the State of Alabama, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

ALLEN J. ELLENDER,
President pro tempore.

Mr. ALLEN thereupon took the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 3, 1972, be dispensed with.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that all committees may be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

INDEFINITE POSTPONEMENT, SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 21

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that calendar No. 105, Senate Concurrent Resolution 21, a concurrent resolution calling for suspension of military assistance to Pakistan, and so forth, be indefinitely postponed.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1972

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in adjournment until 11 a.m. on Monday next.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Later this order was changed to provide for the Senate to convene at 10 a.m. on Monday.)

THEN AND NOW

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, during the 1968 election campaign, when Mr. Nixon was a candidate, he was repeatedly asked on the platform, by the press, and on television to comment on the conduct of the war and of the negotiations in Paris under President Johnson. Mr. Nixon consistently said, although it might have been to his interest to argue otherwise:

I will not comment on any negotiations which in any manner might impede the success of those negotiations.

Period, paragraph.

What a contrast with today's candidates.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. At this time, in accordance with the previous order, the Chair recognizes the distinguished junior Senator from Illinois (Mr. STEVENSON) for not to exceed 15 minutes.

U.S. POLICY ON BANGLADESH

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I returned this week from a brief visit to the new nation of Bangladesh. I saw there the results of almost a year of conflict and a month of outright war. The results can be described, but scarcely comprehended: Hundreds of thousands murdered, tortured, orphaned, hungry, and homeless.

It is impossible to enumerate the casualties in that war. Among these, however, we must count one: The prestige and good name of the United States. For the Nixon administration, as the Anderson papers have clearly demonstrated, cast its lot with the military regime of Yahya Khan; uttered no public criticism when its ally launched a campaign of torture and repression, and allowed itself to sink into a futile, ugly controversy with both India and the people of East Pakistan.

Now the war is over. India and Bangladesh have triumphed. The people of Bangladesh have won their freedom; they are now the eighth largest nation in the world; six hundred and twenty-five million people in India and Bangladesh no longer see as their ally the United States. They have been pushed by our actions toward the outstretched arms of the Soviet Union. Even Pakistan—what is left of it—is, at best, an ungrateful ally. Its new leader, Ali Bhutto, is seeking solidarity with Turkey, the United Arab Republic, and the People's Republic of China; Yahya Khan, Mr. Nixon's erstwhile ally, is under house arrest.

The damage done is incalculable. But it is not beyond repair; we should remember the philosopher's reminder that those who do not understand the past are condemned to repeat it.

It was a long and bloody year for Bangladesh. In December 1970 the Awami League of East Pakistan, led by Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, won a majority of the seats in the national assembly of Pakistan. But Yahya Khan and his regime decided not to convene the legally elected assembly. Ail Bhutto shared in this decision.

Yahya, Ali Bhutto, and their cohorts first made efforts to undo the results of this fair and open election. In March the Bengalis of East Pakistan rose in protest against the government's failure to recognize the election results; disorders broke out, including a general strike.

Yahya Khan, bent upon controlling a people who rejected his control, chose to launch a deliberate campaign of repression; he secretly dispatched thousands of Pakistani troops to the east.

And on March 25, the terror began.

The chemistry was as simple as it was lethal: ancient religious passions inflamed to the boiling point; a calculated government policy of torture and repression; deadly modern weapons, supplied in part by the United States to Pakistan; the revolutionary aspirations of the Bengalis—backed by Indian arms and intensified by the intransigence of Pakistan.

All these elements combined to produce what must go down as one of the most terrible atrocities in the bloody history of man. Sheikh Mujib was arrested and taken to jail in West Pakistan; Pakistani troops, abetted in some cases by the Biharis of East Pakistan, launched a systematic campaign of murder, rape, torture, and pillage.

Within days, the refugees began pouring out of East Pakistan into West Bengal and Assam—at times as many as 100,000 a day streamed into India seeking refuge. Others wandered within East Pakistan, seeking safety from the Pakistani troops. The terror—and the exodus—continued without abating until the war was won by India. All in all, according to the Indians—and we have no reason to doubt their numbers—nearly 10 million people—9.7—sought refuge in India.

None of the headlines about Bangladesh; none of the photographs or news reports, can fully convey the impact of what I saw firsthand.

Last Saturday I talked with Sheikh Mujib. I asked him how many of his people had been murdered by the Pakistanis. He told me that his earlier estimate, 3 million, now appears to have been too low.

And he invited me to see for myself.

I went to the former Pakistani compound of Comilla. There I saw tough Punjabi soldiers holding handkerchiefs to their faces, trying to ward off the stench and the sight of corpses in mass graves. The bodies were mostly those of civilians, some with their wrists still tied behind their backs. More graves wait to be discovered.

I talked with a Bengali barber who had worked within the compound at Comilla. He told me what I was to hear over and over; that Pakistani troops seized people at random, held the women in barracks for the soldiers, then killed the men.

Another witness told me of being rounded up in Comilla in a group of 420 Bengalis. All of them were herded into a squash court where there was only room to stand. Then they were shot. The man who told the story survived and later escaped—by climbing over the corpses in the court. There was one other survivor.

I went to villages which had been leveled, where even the coconut and bamboo trees had been cut down; where the bullocks had been slaughtered in the fields. And I was told that not even the animals in the Dacca Zoo escaped.

Dr. Kissinger, speaking for our Government, made a point of the "amnesty" granted by the Pakistanis to Bengalis not charged with specific crimes. I was told not more than five people were granted amnesty—and two of those were later killed. One recipient of amnesty, an executive of a U.S. corporation, told me he was arrested by our "ally" and charged with working for the CIA. He told me about the subtle form of torture used on him. The Pakistanis beat victims to death in the cell adjoining his. When their screams were over, the bodies were placed in his cell to compel his cooperation.

I talked with Mother Theresa, who is attempting to reach the thousands of women raped and made pregnant by Pakistani soldiers. Under Moslem religious law, they are in disgrace—no longer accepted by their husbands. These victims, she says, are in hiding and many, she fears, are killing themselves. If she reaches them she hopes to care for them and later for their children.

These atrocities, which started on March 25, continued through the summer and fall. When war broke out between India and Pakistan, and defeat for Pakistan was certain, the terror did not abate; it intensified. The Pakistanis, facing military ruin, set out to eliminate businessmen, civil servants, professional men, intellectuals, and students—those capable of building a new nation. Photographs have recorded Pakistani troops murdering students in university dormitories in Dacca; they forced the survivors to drag the bodies into the courtyard, where they, too, were killed.

These atrocities have been documented by many observers. Together, they indict the Yahya Khan regime in Pakistan—and an administration which chose to "tilt" in its favor.

Now, though the violence is vastly diminished, it is not ended. Sheikh Mujib and the dwindling Indian forces are attempting to prevent the Mukti Bahini and others from settling the score with the Biharis. The nights in Dacca are punctuated by gunfire, as the score is settled.

The transportation system, never adequate, is in shambles. Refugees return to devastated villages without shelter or food. International agencies—the U.N., UNICEF, the International Rescue Committee, the International Red Cross—race against the time when the monsoons arrive in late April and it will be too late to build the bridges and deliver the food and the shelter.

I have searched for some evidence to justify the administration's conduct in this tragic affair—and I have searched in vain.

The evidence is that our officials in Washington were well aware of the Pakistani atrocities. Yet the White House apparently ignored these crimes and urged restraint, instead, upon India. With the atrocities mounting daily, Dr. Kissinger sought new ways, as the Anderson papers revealed, to supply more arms to Yahya Khan. He argued that autonomy could come to the east through a process of political evolution. And he called for negotiations—knowing full well that Yahya Khan had jailed, and would not negotiate with, the one man who could represent East Pakistan: Sheikh Mujib.

Nowhere in the dismal record does it appear that the administration seriously urged restraint upon Pakistan. It condemned India; it called for a cease-fire; it cut off aid development loans to India; and food sales under Public Law 480—while it continued both economic and some military aid to Pakistan. During the war, U.S. naval forces appeared in the Bay of Bengal—prolonging the war by encouraging the Pakistanis to believe that U.S. help was on the way.

India waited 8 months before attacking—8 months while the outrages mounted and the refugees poured across the border. India invaded only after Pakistan had first launched air attacks against it.

One can also search the Anderson papers, the statements of Dr. Kissinger, and all the rest, for some rationale for the decision to side with Yahya Khan. The search is fruitless. One could hope that the administration is guilty only of negligence. But the overwhelming evidence indicates that it knew at every step of the way what was taking place in East Pakistan. If there is an explanation, the President should come forward with it. As yet he has failed to do so. And to make matters worse, he refuses to restore normal economic cooperation with India or to recognize Bangladesh.

And since the administration still refuses to recognize Bangladesh, it has no aid operation in East Pakistan and, indeed, has even instructed its few remaining consular authorities to have no contact with representatives of the Bangladesh Government.

This sorry performance points up deep, tragic flaws in the present administration's method of making policy.

First there is, once again, the fatal tendency of the President to separate policy from principle. In this case the President appears to have made his choice—to "tilt" in favor of Pakistan—without regard to the human tragedy in progress before his very eyes. To read the President's statements, or Dr. Kissinger's background statement of December 7; to review the words of Secretary Rogers, Ambassador Bush, and other administration spokesmen, is to search in vain for any perception that principle and self-interest could coincide. Even after Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia—tragedies in which actual American policy has veered farther and farther away from our stated principles—Bangladesh clearly points up the tragedy and foolhardiness of a nation's divorcing its actions from its own best principles.

Second, this episode reveals an ominous trend in the making of foreign policy: The growing isolation of decisionmaking in the White House. The policy regarding Bangladesh, it seems, emerged full blown from the oval office and the White House basement—without regard for the U.S. Ambassador to India; without regard for the State Department; without regard for the Congress, for the realities of politics in South Asia—or the opinion of mankind. Even the National Security Council in this case was an instrument, not for formulating policy, but for implementing the dictates of isolated men at the pinnacle of power. This trend is dangerous for our democracy—and dangerous for the world.

Much has been lost in this sorry episode; not only U.S. influence and prestige in South Asia, but belief in the United States as a friend of the weak and an upholder of self-determination.

Much has been lost. But certain steps can and should be taken to repair the damage and to restore this Nation to its rightful place in the opinion of the world.

First, the United States should recognize Bangladesh. It serves no useful purpose to pretend that the eighth largest nation on earth does not exist. The failure to grant recognition only makes it more difficult for Mujib to pursue a policy of nonalignment. He should not be forced by our hostility or our indifference to expel our consulate and depend the more upon other countries for the economic cooperation he needs for the reconstruction of Bangladesh. Recognition is a precondition to bilateral economic assistance, which in turn could help Mujib maintain order and fulfill the expectations of his people.

Second, the United States should restore normal relations with India by reinstating aid and Export-Import Bank financing for the purchase of American commodities. We should also resume the sale of food under Public Law 480. The ensuing trade would benefit the United States as well as India. More important, it would be a gesture of good will to which the Indians would respond. The people of the world's largest democracy want to be friends and, like the people of Bangladesh, want to maintain their political neutrality.

One thing the United States should clearly not do is resume military assistance to Pakistan. After supplying equipment used to commit atrocities in Bangladesh, it would be little short of barbaric to send still more. Not only would this have a disastrous effect on our already strained relations with the one great power and democracy of the subcontinent—India—it could also invite an increase in Indian arms, leaving Pakistan and India in the same relative position, but closer to another holocaust.

I was heartened in South Asia, as I have been elsewhere in the world, to find, despite our complicity in this tragedy, a deep reservoir of good feeling toward the American people. People everywhere differentiate between the decadencies and good sense of the people of America on the one hand—and the actions of their government on the other. But time is running out.

What is at stake is the influence and good reputation of the United States of America. It is time, therefore, to demonstrate that we are still the nation of good will and generous spirit which millions of the world's people want to believe we are.

There is only one way to demonstrate that fact: To turn aside from the past; to bring our actions into harmony with our rhetoric, our policy into harmony with our high principles.

One place to begin is Bangladesh.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. In accordance with the previous order, the Chair recognizes the distinguished Senator from Delaware (Mr. ROTH) for not to exceed 15 minutes.

(The remarks made by Mr. ROTH when he introduced S. 3123 are printed in the RECORD under Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.)

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. In accordance with the previous order, the Chair recognizes the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE) for not to exceed 10 minutes.

ULSTER

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, in 1170, England invaded Ireland; and in 1921, there was a partition of Ireland in which the 26 counties in the south became the independent nation of Ireland, and the six counties in the north became the country now known as Ulster, which still has a government connected with Great Britain.

Since 1170 there has been great friction between the Irish people and the English. There have been outbreaks nearly approaching war in Ireland many times in the past. There have been abuses in human rights and of human liberties. In the last 3½ years, the situation has deteriorated rapidly; in the last month, that deterioration has accelerated; and in the last few days the deterioration has accelerated even more.

The United States, of course, has a policy—and rightly so—of not intervening in the internal affairs of another state. Yet many of us here in this Nation and in the U.S. Senate are seriously concerned about the internal problems of Ulster.

There we have a nation with 500,000 Catholics and approximately 1,000,000 Protestants. The elected government, since 1970, has consisted of all Protestants, because of the resignation from the government of the few Catholics who earlier had been able to take part. There have been violations of civil rights and of human rights, with the majority denying to the minority certain basic rights. There has been rampant discrimination in housing, in employment, and in political life. As a result of this, there have been serious uprisings.

In order to protect the minority from the majority, and specifically at one time from what was alleged to be police brutality on the part of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, British troops were sent in, at the request both of the government and of the Catholic minority, as a neutral peacekeeping force. British troops replaced the Constabulary, and the B Specials, or auxiliary police, were disbanded entirely. Previously, the Constabulary and the B Specials had numbered in the neighborhood of 5,000 or 6,000 men each.

Yet the British troops did not succeed in preserving order, and were soon opposed both by the Catholics of Northern Ireland and by the Irish Republican Army, a force of about 6,000 men mustered from the south.

Mr. President, I rise today, with my distinguished colleague from New York (Mr. BUCKLEY), because we are seriously concerned about what is happening in Northern Ireland. Bloodshed and killing have been the order of the day most recently. It is a very serious matter. It preys upon not only us here in the United States, but upon people all over the world.

I for one would like to believe that this is not a religious war. Great strides have been made throughout the world, in the ecumenical spirit, among the various religions. I would like to believe instead that the situation in Northern Ireland is a demand by minority people who are crying out for their basic civil rights, their basic human rights. They have not been able to obtain them under their government, and thus they have marched to show their protest against what they believe to be an oppressive majority.

Then, what is the role of the United States? Well, No. 1, we are very seriously concerned about Ireland and about England. Both England and Ireland have been our allies for centuries. It is estimated by our census that there are over 13,200,000 persons of Irish descent in the United States alone, and I would expect that that figure perhaps does not include second, third, and fourth generation Irish. The actual figure is probably much more than that. So we are concerned, because of the ties of many Americans to their homeland in Ireland.

But we are also concerned, because we believe in human rights, even though we have very serious problems of civil rights and human rights in this Nation. Ironically, we talk at this time when there is a filibuster going on in the U.S. Senate on the question of equal employment opportunities. But, be that as it may, what can the United States do, or what should the United States do?

Our distinguished colleague, Mr. BUCKLEY, has proposed that we offer our good offices. I am sure he will talk about his resolution, which I support, and commend him for having introduced, not today, not yesterday, but nearly 2 months ago, because he, as I, have been seriously concerned as we have seen this situation building up and becoming more serious as it has been.

Then, I would suggest that there may be another recourse. Seventeen Western European nations have what is known as a Commission on Human Rights, established by a convention in 1950, when they determined that they would never go back to the problems which had emanated from World War II. That Commission has the authority to send investigating teams into a country, with the permission of that country, in order to determine whether human rights are being violated, and to make its recommendations to the 17 Western European nations.

Then there is an appellate court which was also established by that convention, which may be able to be of some assistance. I suggest that—and I will elaborate upon it more thoroughly—as a possible course of action.

Some persons have talked about the United Nations getting involved. Of course, under article II, section VII, of the United Nations Charter, the United Nations cannot intervene in domestic matters. There is no prohibition on discussing whether to discuss the matter but, as we all know, the General Assembly is not in session at the present time and will not be in session for several months. The Security Council, which could also discuss this matter, is meeting at Addis Ababa.

It would take nine of the 15 members of the Security Council to put the question on the agenda. So I do not hold out much hope for that. A more productive course of action, therefore, would be to call upon the European Commission on Human Rights and the good offices of the United States by saying to its neighbors, its friends, and its allies, "Look, we do not like to see our friends and allies fighting one another. We do not like to see bloodshed. We want to offer our good offices for the purpose of your getting together so that you can discuss this matter and hopefully resolve it."

We are perilously close to next Sunday, when another demonstration, which has been described as a peaceful march, will take place. The situation is similar to the one in Selma, Ala., under Dr. Martin Luther King, when blacks and whites marched to Selma, Ala., at that time, Mr. President, protesting oppression of minorities by the majorities. It is indicated by the leaders of this march on Sunday in Derry that it will be a peaceful demonstration. The British have asked them not to carry on this demonstration, one which they say will consist of 25,000 or 30,000 marching people. There were 12,000 British troops there. Now it is estimated that there are 15,000 British troops in Northern Ireland.

The stage is set for what could be a very serious confrontation, resulting in more bloodshed, more violence in Northern Ireland and, of course, involving our allies, the British Government and the Government of Ireland. So, Mr. President, these are very serious times. We have no desire to intervene in the domestic affairs of another nation. But we would be remiss in our duty as a friend and as an ally if we did not search for means whereby this conflict could be peacefully resolved.

One of the issues, of course, is internment, which started in August of 1971 and is still going on, and has been extended, whereby the British troops can stop persons and arrest them on suspicion—something which always goes against the grain of our Government and of our people.

There is also a call for the British troops to leave.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BROOKE. I yield to my friend from New York.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the distinguished Senator from New York (Mr. BUCKLEY) is recognized for not to exceed 10 minutes.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, I thank my friend and colleague from Massachusetts for his eloquent summary of the tragedy in Northern Ireland, which is a tragedy of which we have been witnessing the escalation over the last 3 years, culminating in the awful killings last Sunday.

The response, unfortunately, will be more demonstrations and still more killings, and the British have responded by sending still more troops to Northern Ireland. This is a tragedy that weighs heavily on the minds of all the parties in Ireland and also the parties in England who are equally involved in these proceedings which men of good will on both sides thus far seem unable to avert. But unless we can find some way of relieving the tensions and the cycle of killings, the situation is apt to deteriorate further, and the real threat of civil war erupting as the Catholic minority seeks to assert its rights looms on the horizon. And the answer to that situation will not be further troops.

I suggest that we in the United States who are deeply concerned, both as human beings and the historic friends of the two peoples involved, can do something positive at this time, can do something meaningful which is calculated to make it easier for both the British and the Irish to meet together to seek to negotiate their differences, to seek to pave the way for the peaceful reunification of Ireland. The climate is right, I sense. The British people for example, have been polled, and they indicate that the great majority of them would like to see the British presence withdrawn from Ireland. Mr. Harold Wilson, the former Prime Minister, has recognized publicly the need for reunification. Even Mr. Paisley in Ulster has spoken of the possibility of reunification with adjustments of the Constitution of the Irish Republic. So the will is there and the influence is there but the method of bringing the people together has not yet been discovered.

I was interested to read in this morning's newspapers that Secretary of State Rogers met separately with both Foreign Minister Hillery of Ireland and the Ambassador from Great Britain, Lord Cromer. Mr. Hillery asked that we offer our good offices. The response of Secretary Rogers was that the United States could not act effectively unless both parties invited us to participate. He said:

Good offices to help the achievement of a political settlement cannot be effective unless it is done with the approval of the parties concerned.

But I think we must recognize that we should not take merely a passive role, and that it is not interference in British affairs if we offer the hand of friendship.

Historically this technique has been resorted to in order to help alleviate tensions, to make it possible for people to talk. Theodore Roosevelt, for example, helped mediate the settlement of the Russo-Japanese war in 1905. A decade or so later, Argentina, Brazil, and Chile helped mediate the conflict between the United States and Mexico.

There is also the Rogers plan, in which the United States has more recently offered its good offices in trying to defuse tensions in the Middle East.

Mr. President, I believe the approach which the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE) and I are proposing today offers a means by which we can, as a practical matter, help the parties stop the bloodshed. I also very much recommend the other imaginative alternative proposed by my colleague, the mechanism which already exists in Europe for the investigation of abuses of human rights. Also, perhaps, still another method would be the Common Market, Ireland and Great Britain both having joined that body this year.

Finally, of course, the United Nations can offer its good offices. There will have to be some means of withdrawing the British troops, ending internment without trial, and interposing another force which will not be held suspect to prevent the parties from clashing during the period of cooling off. Perhaps there could be a U.N. peacekeeping force; but somebody has got to start the talking going, and I believe as ancient friends, we Americans who have so many blood ties to both Great Britain and Ireland, can do something positive, and we must.

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague from New York, first for having offered the resolution, and second, for having joined in his colloquy this morning.

I think, Mr. President, this is just the beginning of discussions of this matter on the floor of the U.S. Senate. I hope there will be more discussions of this nature. I think it will serve a very useful purpose. I think it lets not only Great Britain, but Ireland as well, and the peoples of the world, know of our deep concern about the problems there, and our efforts to lend our good offices and to make suggestions and recommendations for which, as my colleague has well pointed out, there is ample precedent.

I should like at this time to quote from the protocol of the 1950 Convention. It says:

Every member of the Council of Europe—

I add that England and Ireland are members of that Council—

Must accept the principles of the rule of law and the enjoyment by all persons within its jurisdiction of human rights and fundamental freedoms and collaborate sincerely and effectively in the realization of the aims of the Council. . . .

It goes on to enumerate other rights covered by the Convention, which include:

Life, liberty and security of the person; freedom from arbitrary arrest, detention, . . . freedom of opinion and expression, freedom of assembly and association. . . .

Now, certainly, these are principles to which both England and Ireland are committed, and I think that if we can get on with some discussions under the good offices of the United States, under the European Commission on Human Rights, or under the United Nations, if there is a possibility of that. The Irish Foreign Minister, Mr. Hillery also suggested, I believe, that he would be calling on the heads of other nations around the world, particularly in Western Europe—and their good offices may be lent to the effort as well.

I think that perhaps, No. 1, we could start, hopefully, with termination of the internment policy, which I think is in violation of the principles set forth in this convention and in this protocol. No. 2, there could be a phasing out of British troops, over a period of time, during which time we could have some assurances from the Ulster government, for example, that there would not be a return of any militant groups and that there would be control of the Constabulary in Northern Ireland.

On the other hand, Prime Minister Lynch would have control over the Irish Republican Army, which he has indicated he would want to do and could do. Under these circumstances, all parties could get on to a political settlement of the differences.

As I said initially, I think they are not confronted here so much with a religious issue as with a political and economic issue. There is clearly some movement now, even in independent Ireland, with a change in the leadership in the church, to practice wide religious tolerance. Even some of the religious provisions in their constitution would be deleted.

Perhaps someday soon they might get on with what former Prime Minister Wilson has talked about; namely, the unification of Ireland. I do not know whether that is the answer to the problem. I am not suggesting that it is the answer to the problem. I am merely saying that there is nothing there now—even though there has been deep-seated feeling dating back as far as 1170—that in 1972, with the development and great progress we have had in religious understanding, cannot be resolved through negotiations and discussions rather than through bloodshed and violence.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. President, I could not agree more with the summary of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The important thing at this moment is to offer hope to these people that they can achieve justice, that they can achieve true economic and social and political equality, without a resort to demonstrations, without a resort to force. With the relief of tensions. I am confident that the sheer logic of the situation will have that result.

Our offer of help, of good offices, ought not be an attempt to impose a preconceived plan for the resolution of the unhappy situation that now exists.

I express my appreciation to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE) for taking so direct and active an interest in this issue.

Mr. BROOKE. I again commend the Senator and thank him for joining in this colloquy. No matter what is done by the European Commission on Human Rights, as I have suggested, or by the United Nations, I think it is important that Senators join in supporting the resolution of the distinguished junior Senator from New York. I think that, at the very least, we in the United States can offer our good offices to resolve some of the problems confronting Ireland and England.

I am hopeful that 100 Senators will join and sign that resolution, and that we can get it to the President of the United States, to indicate to him how strongly we feel about offering our good offices at this time to avoid what obviously threatens to be a most serious problem confronting not only the countries involved but the world as well.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. At this time, in accordance with the previous order, there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to exceed 30 minutes, with statements therein limited to 3 minutes.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the convening of the Senate on Monday next be changed from 11 a.m. to 10:45 a.m.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. (Subsequently this order was changed to provide for the Senate to convene at 10 a.m. on Monday.)

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BROCK ON MONDAY

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the recognition of the joint leadership on Monday next, the distinguished Senator from Tennessee (Mr. Brock) be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CHANGE IN FOGGY BOTTOM

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, the need for certain reforms in the State Department has been apparent for many years and proposals have been made in the Congress looking to bringing about such reforms.

When William Rogers became Secretary of State, he selected as Deputy Under Secretary for Management, William B. Macomber, who has been well and favorably known to Members of the Senate for many years.

One of Mr. Macomber's principal duties was to bring about some of these needed reforms.

Although there is still a long way to go, and the rate of progress must have been discouraging to many within and without the Department, Secretary Rogers and some of his assistants are entitled to receive more credit than they are given in the Halls of Congress and by the news media generally.

On January 26, Deputy Under Secretary Macomber gave an address in the international conference room of the Department of State setting forth some of the changes within the Department which have gone unnoticed by the public generally.

In this address, he admits there is still a long way to go; but at least there has been a breakthrough toward making this very important Department of the executive branch more efficient, more humane, and somewhat better understood.

I believe that Mr. Macomber should receive full credit for the good work he has been performing in the State Department. I believe that credit should be given where credit is due, and I ask unanimous consent to have Mr. Macomber's address printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHANGE IN FOGGY BOTTOM: AN ANNIVERSARY REPORT

My Colleagues in the Department of State, Two years ago this month this Department launched an unprecedented program of management reform and modernization; and in this same period we have seen it move in a number of very important ways towards a more equitable and effective system of human relations.

On this second anniversary it is appropriate to take stock, to examine what working together we have accomplished in this period of ferment and change, and to focus on what remains to be done.

First let's look at the program of management reform and modernization.

This has been a unique and far-reaching effort. It has been unique in the sense that Secretary Rogers did not, as is traditional in an effort of this kind, turn the job over to a team of experts from outside. Instead, in an unprecedented step, he chose the career professionals themselves to draw the plans. He was convinced that you could do the job better than anyone else.

You responded to his challenge and produced the most comprehensive and searching critique ever written about this Department.¹ If one wants to really understand our problems (and our strengths), no other document can match it. More importantly, after months of consultation with colleagues in the Department and abroad, with other Government agencies, and with many institutions and experts outside of the Government, you produced an extraordinary blueprint for reform. This blueprint consists of over 500 recommendations, about 400 of which have been, or are now being, implemented.

This effort has not received the attention it deserves, which is perhaps understandable. Major changes in management techniques and philosophy are not the stuff of exciting newspaper copy.

It is a significant story, nonetheless.

For in the past two years, through this unique effort in self-analysis and creativity, important new foundations of a modern American foreign office have been laid.

I

It has been argued that developments over the last twenty-five years—the new involvement of most departments of government in foreign affairs and the development of national security council staffs or their equivalents—have lessened the importance of foreign offices everywhere. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The diplomat's job is more important and more complicated than it ever was. He carries his old responsibilities and needs all his old skills; but because of the vastly increased complexity and diversity of our foreign affairs, we need a broader range of skills and expertise; and because of the participation of so many other elements of our government in foreign affairs, our diplomats must now be managers, coordinators and leaders, to a degree undreamed of by their predecessors of a simpler age.

The collective wisdom, experience, and judgment in the foreign affairs field of the people in the United States Department of State is unmatched elsewhere in our Government or in any other government. The job therefore has been to find ways to unfetter those abilities and to bring them more effectively to bear on the Department's evolving responsibilities.

The significance of what has been happening within the State Department during the past two years is this: The career professionals (aware that all foreign offices tend to have a better understanding of what their job used to be than what it is today) have made a major effort to explore and define the new and expanded dimensions of their role. Further, they have determined that the management of the State Department and of the Foreign Service is not just the concern of the administrators. They also have concluded that to meet their new responsibilities, something more is required than the traditional adherence to a low profile and traditional reliance on native ability, experience, old fashioned intuitive judgment and "trying harder."

As a result, here is how far we have come:

We have for the first time a Policy Analysis and Resource Allocation system (PARA) in operation throughout the Department—a systematic process for the identification of issues, interests and priorities, the allocation of our resources in accordance with those priorities, and the periodic review of our policies.²

We have a new concept of team operation among the Seventh Floor principal officers which affords increased control of the Department's planning, decision-making, and allocation of resources. The team concept has permitted a more flexible utilization of the principals' time by breaking the relatively narrow field of specialization that each principal has been assigned. The Seventh Floor team is served by common staffs, operates under the aegis of the Secretary, and is directed by the Under Secretary.³

We have a new management evaluation capability in the expanded Inspector General's staff, which will now evaluate our policies as well as our performance.⁴

We have a new balance between competition and job tenure in our Foreign Service officer promotion system which preserves its competitive nature but provides increased stability and security in the middle years of an officer's career.⁵

We have made major changes in our recruiting activities which are already bringing a much wider range of skills into the Foreign Service Officer Corps than ever before.⁶

We have adopted the concept of a new Foreign Affairs Specialist Corps which has been very popular with our career specialists. Over 870 of these have applied for entrance into this new Corps. Legal objections have been raised against this Corps. I am very hopeful these will be overcome shortly so that this important innovation will play a key role in our modernization effort.⁷

We have established a "Mustang" program to identify clerical and staff support employees with unused talent or undeveloped potential and provide opportunities to them for advancement to officer-level positions through special training and assignments.⁸

We have encouraged the flow of information, new ideas, divergent opinion, and creative dissent within the Department and at our posts abroad through the mechanisms of special message channels, new staff functions, and the continued use of the Secretary's Open Forum Panel.⁹

In a quite different area, and in order to improve our service to the ever-increasing numbers of Americans traveling abroad, we have initiated a program in conjunction with the Postal Service to take passport applications in several hundred first-class post offices throughout the country. This will enable us to expand and improve our service dramatically without incurring the costs involved in establishing more federal facilities.

So on the managerial side these have been two very productive years. Much remains to be done, but much has been accomplished.

II

But modernization and reform, if it is to be really effective, requires more than improved management in these areas I have been discussing.

Of critical importance, as well, is the development of an increasingly effective, fair, and enlightened system of human relations within the Department. Here, too, we have had a remarkable two years, with much progress being made—and with much still left to be done.

To begin with, we have been operating on the simple, unassailable assumption that women possess approximately half the brain power in this country. We have therefore sat down with women employees and designed and implemented a program for encouraging rather than deterring career prospects for women officers. They are now assured equal consideration for assignments, training opportunities, and perquisites, without regard to sex or marital status. Indeed one of the more interesting aspects of programs to enhance career possibilities for women is the development of working family teams in which both the wife and husband are career Foreign Service employees. Over 30 such teams are now in the Department's Foreign Service, and more may be expected soon.¹⁰

The changes we have made in this area have been well publicized. They were made not only in justice to women but in the Department's own self interest, for we can ill afford to ignore this major brainpower pool. I am pleased to report that this fall nearly three times as many women applied to take the Foreign Service exams as applied in 1969—the year before this program began.

Efforts are also underway to accord increased recognition of the professional status and rights of secretaries—still one of the largest and most important groups of women in the Department's Civil and Foreign Services.

We have also addressed the problem of a bill of rights for the spouses and dependents of Foreign Service employees. The voluntary unpaid support that wives have traditionally given to our embassy efforts overseas has constituted one of the great strengths of our Service and also, from a family point of view, one of its most rewarding aspects. But there have been occasions when this tradition was abused and when its voluntary basis not properly understood. Working first with wives and later with the Secretary's Open Forum Panel we have now spelled out the rights of Foreign Service spouses and dependents—and I am confident that rather than weakening the traditional teamwork of Foreign Service families, this bill of rights will strengthen it.¹¹

In the past two years we have continued to emphasize our minority recruitment program despite our personnel cuts and the resultant reductions in our over-all recruitment.

In addition we recognize that there are many persons, some from minority backgrounds, some not, who have the ability to rise to positions of considerable responsibility but who have been denied their opportunity because of inadequacies in their education. With this in mind we have, as I mentioned earlier, created the "Mustang" program which each year will provide opportunities for specially selected employees to advance to officer rank.

Within this critical area of the Department's human relations, however, I believe the creation of a formal employee-management relations system for the Foreign Service is of overriding importance.

Following changes in Civil Service procedure, this new system has just been promulgated by the President.¹² It is a pioneering effort specially designed for the Foreign Service and is the result of extensive debate and consultation between the management of the Department and representatives of the Foreign Service. For the first time members of the Foreign Service will have an important and formal voice in the development of all personnel policies—policies which play such an important part in their lives and careers.

Under this system members of the Foreign Service can elect an organization to be their exclusive representative, and administrative officials in the Department are required to consult with that organization on personnel policies which either the Department or the employees wish to change. If these consultations do not result in agreement, the employee's representative can appeal over the heads of the Department's administrative officials to the Board of the Foreign Service.

The Board of the Foreign Service will have two subgroups to help it carry out its responsibilities. Both of these groups are independent of the administrative side of the Department. First is the three-member Employee-Management Relations Commission made up of representatives of the Department of Labor, Civil Service Commission, and Office of Management and Budget. This Commission will have the final say with respect to the supervision of elections and the adjudication of unfair labor practice complaints.

The second group, working directly under the Board of the Foreign Service, is known as the Disputes Panel. It is made up of one member from the Department of Labor, one from the Federal Services Impasses Panel, one from the public, and two from the Foreign Service. Thus the majority of this Disputes Panel comes from "outside" the Department of State. In addition, the two Foreign Service representatives cannot be part of the management of the Department. When the administrative authorities of the Department are unable to reach agreement in their consultations with the representatives of the Foreign Service employees, it is the function of this disputes group, acting on behalf of the Board of the Foreign Service, to establish the facts and seek a solution through mediation. If this fails, the Panel must then recommend an appropriate solution to the Board of the Foreign Service.

With the development of this employee-management relations system we have passed an historic milestone in the continuing development of the Foreign Service. But this milestone was not reached easily. There were strong differences of views, and much hard bargaining and public controversy.

But what has emerged in the judgment of both the management of the Department and the leadership of the American Foreign Service Association is "a system well adapted to the Foreign Service, and a system under which the men and women of the Foreign Service can have a real voice in the policies and regulations affecting their careers."

Here again, the past two years have seen an important breakthrough. But the job is just beginning, not ending. If this new system is to fulfill its promise, it is incumbent upon all members of the Foreign Service to pay close attention to the positions taken by the employee organization chosen as their exclusive representative. It is incumbent on that organization and the administrative officials of the Department with whom it will be dealing to make every effort to see that this new system works in a fair, constructive and responsible manner.

However, it is not enough simply to build a system where members of the Foreign Service, in the collective sense, will have a stronger and more effective voice in the development of personnel policies. In addition, there is the need for each individual member to have access to a meaningful grievance procedure independent of the Department's personnel authorities, and in which the individual's rights are clearly defined and understood. Until recently such a system did not exist. There was in its stead a formal system of limited scope and an informal system in which every effort was made to be fair, but which was neither independent of the personnel authorities nor characterized by any specific definition of the rights of an aggrieved employee.

We have now instituted an interim grievance procedure which is a major step forward.¹³ The Interim Grievance Board is chaired by William Simkin, who from 1961 to 1969 was Director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, and is made up of distinguished public members as well as career officials with considerable experience in the Foreign Service. Unlike the earlier arrangements, it is set up and operates independently of the personnel and administrative officials of State, AID and USIA.

It is an "interim" grievance procedure because we believe that the definitive grievance procedure should be bargained out in the employee-management relations system—which is just what such a system is for. Once the definitive grievance procedure has been hammered out, the Department will support legislation which incorporates the basic principles of that procedure as an amendment to the Foreign Service Act.

Another crucial area of the Department's human relations is that of involuntary retirement or "selection-out." I believe that such a system, presently required by law, is an essential ingredient of a strong Foreign Service, and I believe that this view is shared by the great majority of Foreign Service Officers.

But this system has recently come under increasing attack. We now have in the employee-management relations system a particularly appropriate means for the representatives of Foreign Service employees to sit down with the Department's management for a careful and thorough reexamination of the selection-out system. I am confident that out of the re-examination will come a reaffirmation of the need for a continued involuntary retirement system; and I am equally confident that in this re-examination we are going to find ways to make it a fairer and stronger system. Fewer than 10 officers are presently scheduled for involuntary retirement between now and June 30th. In view of this upcoming re-examination, the Department has suspended all final selection-out actions between now and that date.

In summary then, the most critical ingredients in the human relations field are the development of a strong employee-management relations system to deal with the development of personnel policies, and the establishment through the employee-management relations system, and ultimately by an amendment to the Foreign Service Act, of a definitive grievance procedure. Under the employee-management relations system we will also be re-examining involuntary retirement procedures and here, as elsewhere, looking for areas where we can strengthen the role of due process.

Some have said that in taking these actions we are undermining the basic discipline of the Foreign Service. Of course, the exact opposite is true. The way to guarantee the continuation of a disciplined Service is to make certain that its basic safeguards and fairness are apparent to all.

But as we move into this new era of the Department's human relations, let me make it clear that I do not believe the old system was as unfair as has sometimes been alleged. In a highly competitive system such as ours, there are bound to be disappointed persons. And while our involuntary retirement system has been run by human beings and is therefore fallible, it is my personal belief that those who manned the system earlier made every effort to make it as fair as possible.

But there is no denying that the system has been a paternalistic one. And even if it was far fairer than its critics give it credit for, it is not—because of its paternalism and its inadequate recognition of both the collective and individual rights of Foreign Service employees—a credible or acceptable system for today.

III

The past two years have been a time of tumult. There has been criticism, disagreement, and public controversy. This is understandable. When a major reform and modernization program is launched, it is predicated on the assumption that things are wrong and need correcting. One should not be surprised, therefore, when there is considerable public focus on what is wrong—and vigorous debate over proposed solutions. This controversy may appear unseemingly by earlier standards of State Department decorum. It is, however—except when disguised by unjust and personal attacks on a dedicated career Foreign Service Officer—a very healthy and useful process.

It would be a mistake to allow the turmoil which has been a part of these last two years or the controversy and clash of views which will accompany the forthcoming employee elections, to obscure what is really going on in this Department. Controversy is an integral part of the progress we are all working for. There have been years in this Department when there has been very little tumult and very little progress. We are in a much better era now.

And now my final point: No effort of this kind starts without antecedents. Much of the credit must go to those career officers among you who in increasing numbers in the years immediately preceding January 1970 pressed for reform and set the stage for what has followed. To you and to the many who joined you in the past two years, we owe a considerable debt.

The question I put to you now is this: Will your commitment to this effort be sustained? Important decisions lie ahead, and modernization is a task which, by definition, is never done. Even in the specific areas I have been reporting on today, the record is one of useful and important beginnings—not final accomplishments.

Modernization as a process will continue in the Department. That is inevitable. The question is whether you, the career professionals, will continue to lead it. If you do, and for as long as you do, this critically important work will be in the best of hands.

Mr. AIKEN. In his address, Mr. Macomber does admit there is still a long way to go, but at least we are on the way, and I believe that he is entitled to a great deal of credit for this.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I join the distinguished senior Senator from Vermont, the dean of the Republicans in this body, in what he has said about Under Secretary of State Macomber.

The Committee on Foreign Relations knows Bill Macomber well—very well—because, for a number of years, under the Eisenhower administration, he served as the liaison between the Department of State and the committee. No man could be more fair; no man, in my opinion, had greater integrity. So far as the members of the committee were concerned, he treated us all alike, told us the facts as he understood them, and did not attempt at any time to play any kind of politics whatever.

After that, he served as Ambassador to Jordan, and his record there was distinguished. Then he came back and, under the present administration, accepted—not with great enthusiasm, but because he thought it was a duty—the position he now occupies as Under Secretary of State for Management.

May I say that the regard for Bill Macomber in the Senate extends to both sides of the aisles, and I know of no Senator, either Democrat or Republican, who does not share that high regard for this man of integrity and dedication, who has done so well in his relations with Congress, and who I think has comported himself with great dignity under difficult circumstances.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of the majority leader.

I will not attempt to enumerate all the changes which Mr. Macomber has been bringing about, but I will mention three or four of them.

He has been changing the recruiting policies and bringing into the Department people of more varied backgrounds. He has put a stop to using the wives of foreign officers as virtual servants for the wife of the Ambassador. This has not been a common practice, but it has been occurring. Now he has succeeded in getting an order putting a stop to that. He has set up a new State Department interim grievance procedure. In that, however, he was pressured somewhat by Congress. But that has been done. He stopped all selection-out firing between now and the end of June while personnel policy is being reviewed. Only 10 persons were scheduled to be fired, but there has been considerable injustice in that field.

Mr. Macomber has done particularly good work in making the progress he has been able to make up to now.

Mr. MANSFIELD. If the distinguished Senator from Vermont will yield further, may I say that if the Senator from Vermont had not done so, it was my intention to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to insert the same remarks. Thus, I join the Senator in that request and state that anyone who looks for perfection is just not looking at anyone who should be considered a human being. We make plenty of mistakes in this body, collectively and individually, but we are continuing to work in the right direction.

Reform has been needed in the State Department. It was long overdue. So far as I am aware, Mr. Macomber has been moving in the right direction, and I wish him all success in the months and years ahead.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the distinguished majority leader for his comments.

PETITIONS

Petitions were laid before the Senate and referred as indicated:

By the ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. ALLEN):

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin:

"1971 SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 19

"Enrolled joint resolution memorializing Congress to enact Federal legislation authorizing state public assistance programs to use vendor and voucher payments in certain circumstances

"Whereas, state administration of a public assistance program should recognize two basic objectives, first, the desirability of delegating some measure of moderate control to the local governments dispensing such assistance, and second, the necessity of taking into account the real difficulties encountered in administering assistance cases where there is a demonstrated mismanagement or misuse of funds; and

"Whereas, in an attempt to meet the latter objective Congress has heretofore enacted sections 603(a) (5) and 606(b) (2) of the federal social security act, which provide in part that aid to families with dependent children may include payments in behalf of any such children made either to another individual concerned with the welfare of those children or to a person furnishing food, shelter, or other goods, services or items to or for them, provided that the number of said individuals or persons (who are commonly referred to as "protective payees") do not exceed 10 per centum of the number of other recipients of aid to families with dependent children in the state for any particular month; and

"Whereas, other sections of the social security act relating to the administration of public assistance require an unrestricted money payment unless the assistance agency has first provided the opportunity for a hearing to determine that the public assistance recipient is incapable of handling his funds, and only then may the agency appoint a protective payee; and

"Whereas, the protective payee system has proven completely unworkable because local welfare directors find it difficult if not impossible to find persons willing to serve as protective payees; and

"Whereas, as of January 1, 1971, Milwaukee county alone had 1,259 active cases in which there had been a demonstrated mismanagement of funds primarily because of failure to pay rent or utilities; and

"Whereas, in certain cases under the federally subsidized program of aid to families with dependent children (AFDC) where there has been demonstrated mismanagement of funds, the local welfare department often finds it necessary to authorize a double payment for rent and utilities after the first payment made from AFDC funds has been misspent, with the second payment coming from strictly county funds; and

"Whereas, failure to authorize federal funds for vendor and voucher payments made to AFDC recipients forces the state to assume an unfair burden in financing public assistance cases where mismanagement of funds has been demonstrated; and

"Whereas, the unrestricted money payment requirement causes problems for both the public and private assistance agencies because some AFDC recipients presently misuse the public funds given them for special needs, such as furniture, and then proceed to obtain these special needs items from private agencies; and

"Whereas, this situation results in a waste of public funds and depletion of the resources of private agencies; and

"Whereas, the practice of prohibiting voucher and vendor payments to AFDC recipients is neither economical nor equitable for state and local agencies administering federal assistance programs; and

"Whereas, as stated in the second paragraph hereof, the Congress of the United States has already established the legislative precedent for a 10 per centum formula of restricted payments in AFDC cases; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate, the Assembly concurring, That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin urges federal legislation to permit a county government or its welfare agency administering federal assistance programs to authorize the following two-fold limited voucher and vendor plan in granting aid to families with dependent children, without the loss of reimbursement of the federal share of such aid: 1st, to dispense grants of aid to all new AFDC recipients in the form of vendor payments and vouchers for commodities for an initial period of up to 120 days wherever it is feasible to do so, provided that the number of new recipients getting restricted payments do not exceed 10 per centum of the number of other AFDC recipients getting assistance from the same county government or agency for any particular month; and 2nd, to give aid to families with dependent children, as provided in section 49.19 (5) of the Wisconsin statutes, in the form of supplies or commodities or vouchers for the same, in lieu of money, as a type of remedial care whenever the giving of aid in such form is deemed advisable by the county welfare director dispensing such aid as a means either of attempting to rehabilitate a particular person having the care and custody of any such children or of preventing the misuse or mismanagement by such person of aid in the form of money payments, provided that the number of such persons getting restricted payments do not exceed 10 per centum of the number of other AFDC recipients getting assistance from the same county government or agency for any particular month; and, be it further

Resolved, That duly attested copies of this adopted resolution be immediately transmitted to the secretary of the federal department of health, education and welfare, the chairman of the finance committee and the ways and means committee and the clerk of the house of representatives of the United States, and to each of the 12 members of congress from this state."

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. ROTH (for himself, Mr. ALLEN, Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. BAKER, Mr. BEALL, Mr. BELLMON, Mr. BENNETT, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. BOGGS, Mr. BROCK, Mr. BROOKE, Mr. BUCKLEY, Mr. CHILES, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. COOK, Mr. COOPER, Mr. COTTON, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. DOLE, Mr. DOMINICK, Mr. ERVIN, Mr. FANNIN, Mr. GAMBRELL, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. GRIFFIN, Mr. GURNEY, Mr. HANSEN, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. HRUSKA, Mr. JORDAN of Idaho, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. MCCLELLAN, Mr. MCINTYRE, Mr. METCALF, Mr. MILLER, Mr. MOSS, Mr. PEARSON, Mr. PERCY, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. SAXBE, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. TAFT, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. TOWER, and Mr. WEICKER):

S. 3123. A bill to impose a statutory limit on expenditures and net lending during fiscal year 1973. Referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill providing for a strict limitation on Federal spending for fiscal year 1973. Forty-eight Senators now join me in the introduction of this measure.

Nearly 3 months ago, I stood here and asked the Senate to vote for a ceiling on 1972 expenditures. I asked that we curtail spending for this current fiscal year to the $229.2 billion which the President had requested in his budget message 1 year ago.

In November, when I presented that amendment to the Revenue Act of 1971, outlays, which include net lending, were projected to reach $232 billion in fiscal year 1972. The deficit, on a unified basis, was predicted to be $28 billion, and on a Federal funds basis, just under $34 billion.

Unfortunately, this year's budget message proved these estimates wrong. With 6 months left to go in this fiscal year, spending is forecast to be $236.6 billion, with a deficit of $44.8 billion in Federal funds, $38.8 on the unified basis. This latter calculation of course includes the surplus in the many trust funds now in operation. Though we tax more than we pay out under these programs, the surplus is used to buy Treasury debt incurred as the result of extra spending elsewhere. The unified concept of budgeting only helps muddy the waters. I, for one, feel the trust fund accounts should be withheld from the deficit calculation.

Regardless of the methodology though, the message remains the same. Our Federal budget faces a larger deficit now than any time since World War II. Obviously, we in Congress are responsible for part of this.

But adding to the deficit have been lower-than-expected GNP, personal and business income, reflecting lower actual tax receipts in this fiscal year. Furthermore, programs such as those administered by the Commodity Credit Corporation, have experienced "uncontrolled" spending bulges of more than a billion dollars.

So, Mr. President, I am asking again today that we consider the dire state of this Government's budget. On January 25 the distinguished Senator from Montana (Mr. MANSFIELD) and the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. BYRD) summarized the budget crisis in very succinct terms. Let me only remind the Senate that the pressure for new programs, increases in old programs, and the built-in cost of living increases under our Federal employee retirement programs can only add to the prospect that spending will escalate.

Let me make another point that shows, over a longer time period, that all administrations have been faced with this same problem. In the 11 years between 1962 and the estimates for 1973, our gross national product in money terms has grown at a compound rate of 6.9 percent, while Federal spending has outpaced it, growing at a compound rate of 7.9 percent.

To finance this growing Federal participation in our national economy, we have borrowed at a compound rate of 4.3 percent increase per year. But due in large part to the Treasury's difficult task of placing this debt, interest on the debt has grown more than twice as fast as the principal, at a compound rate of 8.9 percent.

Many noteworthy economists have argued that concern for the size of the Nation's debt is a meaningless argument, since it is money the Nation owes itself. In part they are right, but economists of all persuasions recognize that debt held outside the country can be a major influence on this Nation's policy. The most recent issue of the Federal Reserve Bulletin shows that between January and November 1971, the U.S. debt held by foreign investors more than doubled from $20.9 billion to $44.1 billion.

Can we reasonably expect foreign confidence in the dollar to continue if our budget repeatedly shows spending far beyond our inclination to tax? Secretary Connally has recently concluded a delicate series of negotiations with the Group of Ten, under which the United States has agreed, in principle, to revalue the dollar downward. Sometime later this session we will be asked to consider that measure. And it is my opinion we can only avoid further devaluations by bringing our fiscal policies more in line with world expectations.

We cannot exist in an economic vacuum. This year's staggering trade deficit of more than $2 billion only helps punctuate our reliance on world opinion and confidence in our economy.

In short, we are facing an election year in which the temptation to spend will surely increase, but where our ability to spend will be determined largely by an economy showing only mixed signs of recovery and a world marketplace which may place severe pressures on us for domestic economic reform.

It seems necessary, then, that we face this situation with a "no nonsense" attitude. Two weeks ago, I placed in the RECORD an article from the Washington Post, indicating that the President might ask Congress for a spending ceiling. The following day, the budget message included a request for such a ceiling.

Today, I am asking that we act now, early in the session, to pass this bill which would bind both the executive and Congress to an airtight ceiling on outlays—expenditures plus net lending.

There are no exceptions. In several previous attempts, Congress has tried to limit spending, but excluded the so-called uncontrollable elements of the budget—interest payments, unemployment benefits, social security and veterans benefits, and so forth. Funds for the Vietnam war were also exempted from the 1968 and 1970 legislative measures.

But this is a bill which plugs those holes. Since total Federal spending effects total Federal borrowing, we must take the bit in our teeth and pass the only workable legislation which will keep the lid on all of our spending.

I am not completely convinced that our trading partners embrace the full employment method of budgeting. Many see only another U.S. deficit running at $36.1 billion in Federal funds, $25.5 under the unified calculation. It is these perceived deficits which will continue to place pressure on the dollar and force interest rates back up.

Nevertheless, I have asked that we adopt the administration's figure of $246.3 billion, confident that the "water" which is included in every budget will be enough to soak up any unexpected increases in "uncontrollables." However, I would be happy if the Senate would accept a lower figure.

Mr. President, I heartily concur with the distinguished majority leader's concern for our runaway spending. It is up to Congress to impose a statutory limit early in this session so that we may appropriate funds in full knowledge of the goal we have set for ourselves and the administration.

I welcomed Mr. MANSFIELD's support last November, when, without administration's support, I came within seven votes of having a similar measure passed. I am hopeful that now, with endorsement from the White House, I can garner bipartisan support for a measure which clearly is in the Nation's best interest.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3123

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) expenditures and net lending during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1973, under the Budget of the United States Government shall not exceed $246,300,000,000.

(b) The President shall, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, reserve from expenditure and net lending, from appropriations or other obligatory authority heretofore or hereafter made available, such amounts as may be necessary to effectuate the provisions of subsection (a).

(c) In the administration of any program as to which—

(1) the amount of expenditures is limited pursuant to subsection (a), and

(2) the allocation, grant, apportionment, or other distribution of funds among recipients is required to be determined by application of a formula involving the amount appropriated or otherwise made available for distribution, the amount available for expenditure (as determined by the President) shall be substituted for the amount appropriated or otherwise made available in the application of the formula.

S. 3125. A bill to amend the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended, to provide for a Columbia-Snake-Palouse program. Referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to submit a statement on behalf of the distinguished Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) as well as introducing a bill on behalf of the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) and his colleague, Mr. MAGNUSON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BENTSEN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR JACKSON

Senator Magnuson and I introduce this legislation today to help solve a major soil erosion problem in the Pacific Northwest.

The legislation permits the Department of Agriculture to enter into special soil conservation contracts with farmers and landowners in the Columbia-Snake-Palouse region. The farmers in this region, which covers a 46-county area in Washington, Oregon and Idaho, are suffering millions of dollars of losses in damage to crops as well as enormous amounts of irreplaceable topsoil washing down to the sea each year.

This conservation and environmental program is similar to one now in operation in the Great Plains area. It is designed to bring the severe water and wind erosion of the area's farm land under control, while substantially reducing sedimentation and pollution of the air and water.

Soil erosion in the area has damaged domestic water supplies, adversely affected fish and wildlife, diminished the value of recreational developments and caused more expensive road maintenance.

We believe that legislation is necessary to help cope with these problems as well as helping to minimize the direct losses to farmers in the form of crop damage and soil eroded by wind and water.

We join our colleagues in the House, who have introduced similar legislation, in urging prompt action on this bill.

By Mr. MONDALE:

S. 3127. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to eliminate the monthly premium requirements for individuals covered under the supplementary medical insurance program established by part B of such title. Referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MONDALE. Mr. President, today I am introducing with Senators HUMPHREY, MCGOVERN, STAFFORD, MCGEE, PELL, HART, RANDOLPH, INOUE, MONTOMY, and HUGHES a bill to eliminate the medicare part B premium. This premium is now paid by more than 19 million of our elderly citizens. Ninety-six percent of all those who are eligible for medicare hospitalization also pay the premium for supplementary medical insurance.

The part B premium is a terrible burden for many of our elderly citizens. Since 1967, the premium has gone from $3 per individual per month to $5.60 per month per individual. And if nothing is done about it, the premium will continue to rise. We are all aware of the rapid increase in medical costs, and if the premium is not eliminated, month by month our elderly will be forced to pick up a share of these rapidly rising costs—$5.60 a month may not seem like much to most Americans, but to many of the elderly it is a high and cruel monthly charge. For many of them, it means the difference between being able to buy a new pair of shoes or going another year or two with the old shoes. One of my constituents has recently written me that she has not had a new pair of shoes in 10 years, or a new dress in four—25.3 percent of the elderly are poor and this percentage of poor is twice our national average.

It is a national disgrace compounded by the fact that we ask these old people to lay out almost $6 a month from their meager incomes for this medical insurance program.

The average social security benefit is only $120 a month, so that for the average social security beneficiary the elimination of the part B premium is the equivalent of almost a 5-percent raise in social security benefits. The premium payments which they save will be immediately available to them for their use.

I am in favor of raising social security benefits, not only by eliminating this premium, but by voting a larger benefit increase than the 5 percent suggested in H.R. 1. But the elimination of the premium will be an important step in the right direction.

The elimination of the premium will not eliminate completely doctor bills and related fees which so burden our elderly. Supplementary medical insurance still will include a heavy deductible charge.

Medical expenses which are not covered by supplementary medical insurance because of the deductible features, cost the elderly more than $1 billion per year. And these charges will continue to fall on the elderly even if the premium is eliminated. In fact, H.R. 1 calls for an increase in a deductible which is now $50 to $60, and it includes a provision for a 20-percent coinsurance feature.

I think these deductibles should be eliminated also, but at the very least we must eliminate the premium.

Many people have asked me how I intend to finance the elimination of the premium. At present, the elderly pay 50 percent of the costs of supplementary medical insurance through the premium. The other 50 percent is paid from general revenues. My bill shifts the entire cost of the supplementary medical insurance program to general revenues.

I was pleased by the President's announcement in the state of the Union message that he would support the elimination of the part B premium. However, I was disappointed to see in his budget that he intends to shift the $1.4 billion cost of eliminating the premium to the payroll tax. This is an important difference between his proposal and my bill.

Mr. President, in my opinion it would be grossly unfair to shift the cost of eliminating the premium to the payroll tax. Our elderly citizens do not want to burden their working children unfairly by shifting the burden of this premium to the payroll tax. The costs of treating our elderly fairly should be borne by general revenues and by all the taxpayers.

Everyone knows that the payroll tax, unlike the income tax and the corporation tax, is regressive, falling particularly heavily on the salaried workingman.

Capital gains, interest payments and other income sources which the salaried workingman rarely enjoys, are not touched by the payroll tax.

We recognized in 1967 that 50 percent of the costs of supplementary medical insurance should be borne equitably by all American taxpayers. It would be a step backward to now ask only Americans with salary income to finance the elimination of the premium.

Mr. President, shifting the cost of eliminating the part B premium to the payroll tax would require a very steep rise in that tax. Estimates are that financing elimination of the part B premium through the payroll tax would add 0.25-0.3 percent to both the employee's and the employer's tax. The 1972 tax would jump from an already high 5.2 percent to about 5.3 percent. In 1973, the rates would be 5.95 percent for both the employee and the employer.

If, on the other hand, the cost is paid by an increase in the payroll earnings base, rather than an increase in the tax rate, this would be fairer. But not as fair as shifting the cost to general revenues. Any method of financing which does not recognize the payroll tax as less progressive than financing from general revenue will be a step backward from the position taken in 1967.

We need to eliminate the part B premium. We need to improve the situation of our elderly in many other ways also. Prescription drugs should be covered by Medicare. Medicare deductibles should be reduced and eliminated. But we should not try to finance all or even most of these improvements by taxing only the American workingman or woman through the payroll tax. Payroll taxes are increasing too fast while the more progressive income tax and corporation taxes have actually been falling. If we do not quickly come to recognize the danger in increasing the payroll tax, the American worker, who alone pays the payroll tax, is going to become an opponent of a better break for the elderly.

The Wall Street Journal has joined many others recently in recognizing the alarming trend in our tax policy. Progressive taxes are being reduced while payroll taxes are increasing. Moreover, there is talk of instituting a regressive sales tax at a national level. Call it what you like, a tax on the value added is a sales tax and it will hurt the poor and workingclass people while the wealthy will be spared. The part B premium should be eliminated but this necessary and humane step should be financed by progressive taxes which are paid by everyone.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3127

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 1831 of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 1831. There is hereby established an insurance program to provide medical insurance benefits in accordance with the provisions of this part for individuals 65 years of age or over who are covered under part A or who elect to enroll under such program, to be financed from funds appropriated by the Federal Government."

(b) Section 1837 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 1837. (a) Any individual who, for the month of July 1972, or any succeeding month, is covered by the hospital insurance program established by part A shall also be covered by the program established by this part.

"(b) Any individual who is not covered by the program established by this part for the month of July 1972, or any succeeding month, by reason of the provisions of subsection (a), shall, if he is eligible under section 1836 to enroll in the program established by this part, secure coverage by enrolling therefor in such manner and within such time period, which shall not be later than the month following the month in which such individual applies for enrollment under such program, as the Secretary shall by regulations prescribe."

(c) Sections 1837, 1838, 1839, 1840, and 1843 of such Act are repealed.

(d) Section 1844 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 1844. There are authorized to be appropriated from time to time, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Federal Supplementary Medical Insurance Trust Fund, such sums as may be necessary to assure that there will be, at all times, sufficient moneys in such Fund to make prompt payment of benefits provided under this part and the administrative expenses thereunder, and otherwise assure that any other financial obligations of such fund can promptly be met."

Sec. 2. The amendments and repeals made by the first section of this Act shall be effective on and after July 1, 1972.

By Mr. KENNEDY:

S. 3129. A bill to authorize the establishment of the Longfellow National Historic Site in Cambridge, Mass., and for other purposes. Referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

THE LONGFELLOW HISTORIC SITE

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation today to establish the Longfellow National Historic Site in Cambridge, Mass. This legislation provides that the Secretary of Interior may acquire the home of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow at 105 Brattle Street in Cambridge for establishment as the Longfellow National Historic Site.

The Longfellow home is not only an outstanding example of colonial architecture, but it served as George Washington's headquarters in 1775 and 1776 and was the home of the poet, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, from 1837 to 1882. It is only fitting that this home be preserved in public ownership for the benefit and inspiration of all the citizens of the United States.

We are indeed fortunate that through the centuries the Longfellow home has been maintained with great care and despite some alterations the structure remains intact architecturally and is in a state of good repair. Those members of the community who realized long ago that they were in possession of a great national historic resource determined to keep the home in excellent condition for generations to come. And for this we can only feel a very deep gratitude.

In July 1775, the Longfellow home became George Washington's headquarters for 10 months during the siege of Boston. Longfellow's association with the house began in 1837 when he rented a room there. In 1843 Henry Wadsworth Longfellow and his bride were given the home as a wedding present and enjoyed life there until 1882. Portions of some of Longfellow's greatest works were written here: "The Courtship of Miles Standish," "Evangeline," "Hiawatha," and the "Skeleton in Armor." The buildings, grounds, and furnishings including some priceless art objects have remained essentially as they were when Longfellow lived and wrote there.

I am happy to introduce today this legislation to establish this beautiful home as a national historic site. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of my remarks the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3129

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to preserve in public ownership for the benefit and inspiration of the people of the United States, a site of national historical significance containing a dwelling which is an outstanding example of colonial architecture and which served as George Washington's headquarters during the siege of Boston in 1775-1776, and from 1837 to 1882 as the home of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to acquire by donation the fee simple title to the real property and improvements thereon, together with furnishings and other personal property, situated at and known as 105 Brattle Street, Cambridge, Massachusetts, for establishment as the Longfellow National Historic Site.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior is further authorized to accept the donation of not less than $200,000, and such other sums of money as may be tendered from time to time by the Trustees of the Longfellow House Trust, established pursuant to indentures dated October 28, 1913, and November 18, 1914, and such funds or any part thereof and any interest thereon, may be used exclusively for the purposes of administration, maintenance, and operation of the Longfellow National Historic Site.

Sec. 3. The Longfellow National Historic Site shall be established when title to the real and personal property described in section 1 of this Act and the sum of $200,000 as set forth in section 2 of this Act have been accepted by the Secretary of the Interior, and upon such establishment, the Longfellow National Historic Site shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with the Act approved August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535), as amended and supplemented, and the Act approved August 21, 1935 (49 Stat. 666).

Sec. 4. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

By Mr. STEVENS:

S. 3130. A bill to amend Public Law 92-203, an act to provide for the settlement of certain land claims of Alaska Natives and for other purposes. Referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill to amend Public Law 92-203, which was the Alaska Native Land Claims Settlement Act of 1971. One of the difficulties of that act was that the moneys to be paid to Alaska Natives from the Federal Treasury as part of the settlement will be paid over to regional corporations which have had to be formed. In each of the 12 regional areas of Alaska there is a regional association comprised of Alaska Native people. Each of these now has the duty to form a regional corporation and to assist the Natives of each village in the area of each regional corporation also to incorporate. The act we passed last December also places a duty on the village and regional corporations to identify lands which will be conveyed to them pursuant to the Alaska Native Land Claims Settlement Act.

Unfortunately, the moneys will not be paid to the regional corporations until the roll of those entitled to share in the settlement is completed. This will be done, we trust, in about 2 years. Meanwhile, there is an immediate need for funding for the purpose of organizing the corporations and for the purpose of identifying the lands to be conveyed to the regional village corporations.

I have discussed the problem of funding these regional and village corporations on an interim basis with responsible financial institutions both within and without Alaska. The legal advisers of these institutions have taken the position that loans cannot be made beyond the limits of loans to individuals until the regional corporations are legally formed and approved by the Secretary of the Interior. We are hopeful that this will be done in the very near future and that advances will be made by the institutions to those corporations to start their work which is vital to the completion of this settlement. In any event, it is apparent that in these 2 first fiscal years before the final loan is completed money will be needed by the regional and village corporations.

One of the agreements made in our conference committee and approved by the Congress was that there should be $12.5 million available in the first fiscal year and $50 million in the second fiscal year. To place these moneys in a fund in the Treasury will be of no use to these regional village corporations, which so vitally need the funds to initiate the work for the Alaska Native people in each area.

I realize there is a difficulty in terms of identifying the villages which will be eligible for participation under the Alaska Native Land Claims Settlement Act. Without attempting to decide that question, the bill I have introduced today provides that the regional associations may advance funds to village corporations only if the village for which the corporation is organized is listed on the Preliminary Statement of Eligibility prepared by the Bureau of the Census showing that 25 or more Native residents resided in such village on the date of the 1970 census.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the Record at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Public Law 92-203 shall be amended by adding at the end of section 6(c) thereof the following:

"Provided, That there shall be advanced to each regional association the sum of $1,000,000 in fiscal year 1972 and $3,000,000 in fiscal year 1973 which shall be used solely for organization of the regional corporations and village corporations within each region and to identify land for such corporations pursuant to the Act of December 18, 1971. Such advance shall be credited against the first moneys due to such corporations under this Act and shall first be used to repay any loans advanced to such corporations by any financial organization after December 14, 1971. No funds may be advanced by any regional association to any village corporation unless the village for which such corporation was organized is determined by the Bureau of the Census to have had 25 or more Native residents living within such village according to the 1970 census."

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

S. 2981

At the request of Mr. AIKEN, the Senator from Utah (Mr. BENNETT), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. BIBLE), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. FULBRIGHT), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. MCGEE), the Senators from Rhode Island (Mr. PASTORE and Mr. PELL), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS), and the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. MONTOYA) were added as cosponsors of S. 2981, a bill to amend the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act and the Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Act.

S. 3121

At the request of Mr. SCOTT, the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE) was added as a cosponsor of S. 3121, a bill to extend the Commission on Civil Rights for 5 years.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 107

At the request of Mr. TOWER, the Senator from Illinois (Mr. STEVENSON) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 107, a joint resolution to authorize and request the President to issue annually a proclamation designating the month of February of each year as "American History Month."

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF RESOLUTIONS

At the request of Mr. TUNNEY, the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BOGGS) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 145, urging the Voice of America to be broadcast in the Yiddish language to the Soviet Union.

At the request of Mr. CASE, the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. RIBICOFF) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 214, relative to the submission of any Portuguese base agreement as a treaty.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 57—SUBMISSION OF A CONCURRENT RESOLUTION CALLING FOR A NATIONAL DAY OF PRAYER FOR THE CAUSE OF WORLD PEACE

(Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.)

NATIONAL DAY OF PRAYER FOR THE CAUSE OF WORLD PEACE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Bible tells us that "the work of righteousness shall be peace." On February 21 of this year, the President of the United States will begin a journey to do the work of righteousness. He will go to do the work of a people who, however often we may falter and fail in our efforts, still seek to be a righteous people—a people who covet no nation's holdings.

We covet the future, because it belongs to our children and their children and so on. It belongs as well to the children of those who would make themselves our adversaries, and we cannot suppose that the leaders or the laborers of any other nation love their children less than we love our own. This much we share with them, and more. We share the same planet, and the same destiny as inhabitants of this planet. We share the same fate as children of a just God, who must judge us all. We share the same responsibility for our deeds—and we cannot suppose that a just God finds satisfaction in the pain of some of his creatures, and sorrow in the pain of others—so that our deeds must be judged equally with the deeds of those whom we oppose in the world.

In these things that we share, the peoples of the world are united. We see this clearly. It is our hope that the leaders of the other great powers also see it clearly. By what we hold in common, we hope to find a common road to peace. We believe that there is today as great an opportunity as has occurred in this century to find a lasting peace. In this belief and in this hope, President Nixon will go in search of that peace.

And as we all share in the desire for peace as we must all share in the hope that he will succeed. But our hopes alone are not sufficient. We must send our prayers as well.

As a gesture of that shared desire and as a demonstration of our good will, I hereby offer a resolution to read as follows:

Whereas the American people share with all the peoples in the world an earnest desire for peace and the relaxation of tensions among nations; and

Whereas it is the policy of the United States to engage in negotiations rather than confrontations with other nations; and

Whereas on February 21, 1972, the President of the United States will begin a historic visit in the Peoples Republic of China to confer with that nation's leaders with the purpose of seeking more normal relations between the two countries and exchanging views on questions of mutual concern; and

Whereas the people of the United States hold the highest and most fervent hopes for the success of the President's mission; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of Congress

(1) That Monday, February 21, 1972, be commemorated as a day of united support for the President's efforts in pursuit of the relaxation of international tensions and enduring and just peace;

(2) That the leaders of all nations and men of good will throughout the world be urged to devote all possible efforts to promote the cause of peace and international harmony as set forth in the preamble to the Charter of the United Nations;

(3) That the President designate Sunday, February 20, 1972, as a National Day of Prayer for the cause of world peace; and

(4) That copies of this resolution be sent to the Governors of the several States and be delivered by the appropriate representatives of the United States Government to the appropriate representatives of every nation of the world.

Mr. President, the quest for peace knows no partisanship, no regionalism—nor does it recognize nationality or ideology. The quest for peace is its own universal cause.

I extend a firm and open invitation to all my colleagues to join in sponsoring this declaration of our Congress and our people's hope and support for the president.

And I would trust that with the cooperation of the Senate leadership, it might secure expedited consideration and speedy approval and serve as a means of saying to the President, as in the scriptures, "Go in Peace."

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 58—SUBMISSION OF A CONCURRENT RESOLUTION CALLING FOR THE RECOGNITION OF BANGLADESH

(Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.)

RECOGNITION OF BANGLADESH

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am submitting a concurrent resolution today calling for U.S. diplomatic recognition of Bangladesh. As early as December 15 I urged the President to consider extending diplomatic recognition as one step toward ending the crisis. Since that time open hostilities have abated. Accordingly, I urged the President on January 11, at which time other governments had recognized the sovereignty of Bangladesh, to extend recognition to that country and the government of Sheikh Mujibur Rahman.

Today I am offering a resolution which incorporates the points I made in my remarks of December 15 and 21 of January. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. CON. RES. 58

Whereas the territory of East Pakistan was proclaimed the independent country of Bangladesh on April 10, 1971;

Whereas the elected head of the Awami League, Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, returned to Bangladesh on January 10, 1972 and set up a popularly accepted government on January 12, 1972;

Whereas the Rahman government is in full control of a defined territory and population;

Whereas several governments have already extended diplomatic recognition to Bangladesh;

Whereas the Congress has authorized and appropriated relief assistance for refugees from East Pakistan, now known as Bangladesh;

Whereas the United Nations and several voluntary organizations have organized relief assistance to India and the territory of Bangladesh;

Whereas a significant portion of American assistance to India, provided under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 as amended, was cut off during the war in South Asia; therefore, let it be

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Congress that the President should extend immediate diplomatic recognition to the country of Bangladesh and the government of Sheikh Mujibur Rahman; be it further

Resolved, That the Congress urge the President to plan immediately to utilize the funds which Congress has authorized and appropriated for relief assistance, for economic and humanitarian assistance programs for East Pakistani refugees, especially those programs run under international auspices; be it further

Resolved, That the Congress urge the President to resume economic assistance to India which was cut off during the war in South Asia; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress urge the President to make every effort possible to restore good relations between the government of India and the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, this resolution calls upon the President to do four things:

First. Extend recognition to the sovereign country of Bangladesh and the government of Sheikh Mujibur Rahman;

Second. Provide economic and humanitarian assistance to Bangladesh from funds already authorized by Congress for this purpose;

Third. Resume fully funded economic assistance programs to India, provided under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1971 and earlier acts; and Fourth. To take other appropriate steps to improve our relations with India.

I offer this proposal in an effort to repair the damage which has already been wrought in our relations with the Bengali people of Bangladesh and the Government of India.

In past remarks I have cataloged a list of criticisms on our policies and actions in South Asia.

I do not intend to do that today. Stories appear every day pointing out U.S. mismanagement throughout the entire crisis. They indicate the cloistered and superficial way some of our most important foreign policy decisions are made.

My resolution seeks to solidify our relations with the two most largely populated countries of the South Asian subcontinent: Bangladesh and India.

I believe our Government should join other governments who have extended diplomatic recognition to Bangladesh. This step is a symbolic gesture of good will and also an essential measure if we intend to participate in any humanitarian relief assistance in that part of the world. And participate we should. We must have diplomatic relations to carry out aid programs and establish interim contacts with the people of Bangladesh.

Funds have already been authorized and appropriated by Congress for this purpose. The United States and the World Bank are preparing for a full-scale relief effort and other voluntary agencies have been working for a considerable amount of time with the refugee problem. All the President has to do is make these funds available to the organizations which in his estimation are best equipped to handle this major task. I urge him to work as much as possible with the United Nations and its subsidiary organizations. Not only is the U.N. equipped to handle the job, but it needs the support of the United States to demonstrate just how viable and effective an institution it really can be.

I am not suggesting that the United States take on the entire burden of reconstruction and rehabilitation for Bangladesh itself. The Government of Bangladesh does not want to become the breadbasket—as Dr. Kissinger has put it—of the United States any more than the United States wants it to. What I am proposing is that we utilize funds the Congress has already authorized in the most effective manner possible and that we join in aid consortia with other countries assisting Bangladesh in its efforts to get back on its feet.

With respect to India, I have proposed that the United States call off its suspension of $87.6 million of economic assistance for India. Our Government originally suspended these funds which were in the pipeline on December 6. The ostensible reason was that these funds were not covered by irrevocable letters of credit, and therefore, could be suspended for further review. What our Government apparently intended was to rebuke the Government of India for its actions.

The Government of India has acted in a dignified manner and to my knowledge has not formally requested the $87.6 million, which were virtually committed by our Government. It would, therefore, be a gesture of good faith to restore these funds. I would even hope that our Government would contemplate more assistance to India, not for purposes of buying back a broken friendship, but simply for alleviating the tremendous human burden which Indians have been forced to bear due to the massive influx of refugees from East Pakistan.

Finally, I urge the President to make other gestures of good faith. There are subtle ways to do this, such as writing to the Prime Minister in response to her letter, stepping up diplomatic contacts and consultations, and establishing a network of cultural exchanges between our two countries.

I do not think that India is a capricious country. Her historic friendship with the United States cannot be broken easily, but we have tested India's friendship the last few months in a way which we ourselves would find difficult to endure. We should not test India to the breaking point. Unless President Nixon reverses his present course, I fear that is the direction we may be going.

I urge the President and my colleagues who will be voting on this resolution to recognize the importance of the stakes. Bangladesh and India, the entire world, is waiting for our response.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF A CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 55

At the request of Mr. HOLLINGS, the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE) and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. RIBICOFF) were added as cosponsors of Senate Concurrent Resolution 55 expressing the sense of Congress that the President should immediately recognize Bangladesh as an independent foreign country and recognize the Government of that country.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF AN AMENDMENT

AMENDMENT NO. 832

At the request of Mr. KENNEDY, the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. HUMPHREY), and the Senator from California (Mr. TUNNEY) were added as cosponsors of amendment No. 832 proposed to H.R. 12067, the foreign aid appropriation bill, 1972.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF DATE OF INDIAN HEARINGS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON), I ask unanimous consent that a statement concerning a change of date with respect to hearings by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs on S. 2724, the Indian comprehensive education bill, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF DATE OF INDIAN HEARINGS

I wish to announce to the Senate and the public that because of the Lincoln Day recess it has been necessary to make a second change in the scheduling of the hearings set by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs on S. 2724, the Indian Comprehensive Education bill. The hearings now set for February 9 and 10 will instead be held on March 6 and 7. At that time we will receive testimony from Indian and nongovernment witnesses. Testimony from the Departments of the Interior and Health, Education, and Welfare and from national education organizations will still be received on March 1 as originally planned.

The hearings on all three days will begin at 10 a.m. in room 3110, New Senate Office Building.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

IN DEFENSE OF AMERICA

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, we so often hear bitter, unjust criticism of the United States and its policies from the officials of foreign government that we sometimes are inclined to forget that this country has many good and loyal friends overseas. In this connection, I recently ran into a newspaper article from Bonn, Germany, written by Mr. Peter Petersen, a member of the West German Parliament representing Wuttemberg-Baden. The article is unusual because of its clarity, its truth and its acknowledged prejudice on behalf of the United States.

Mr. Petersen makes no bones about his reasons. He cited the first one as follows:

America saved my people from starvation not so very long ago. No German called that U.S. imperialism. Thousands of American soldiers—225,000 to be exact—are stationed in my country and because of this commitment and their loaded guns we are still a free people.

Where I come from, we still know what freedom means—because 17 million of us are locked up behind barbed wire, walls and mine fields, behind what amounts to the ugliest and most inhuman border in the world. Some 400 of my people have been shot and killed because they wanted to go from one part of our country to another. The American commitment to freedom and the price Americans are paying for that every day saves us from the fate of our neighbors, the Czechs who are the victims of imperialism.

Yes, I am prejudiced, and I don't apologize for the fact that I love America.

Mr. Petersen says he holds to that prejudice even though a recent trip to this country caused him considerable worry and concern. He mentioned encountering personally people who were having trouble with unemployment and crime and other problems.

He says, by way of comparison:

When I was in this country 20 years ago the people in whose homes I stayed never locked their doors. This time I was warned not to walk back to my hotel after a concert.

Mr. Petersen was especially disturbed over American students who in all sincerity talk about U.S. imperialism. He says they don't realize that the problem in the world today is exactly the other way around. He explained:

We have a crisis in the free world because Americans appear to us to shrink back from the responsibility that goes with being the strongest power in the world. It is clear to us that the Soviet don't have such qualms—and that is why they fill every vacuum America and its allies are leaving.

Mr. President, because this article is such an unusual and welcomed expression of gratitude and such an incisive appraisal of how we look today to our foreign friends, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Petersen's article, entitled, "The American Dream" be printed in its entirety in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN DREAM

(By Peter Petersen)

BONN.—I am prejudiced when writing about America.

America saved my people from starvation not so very long ago. No German called that U.S. imperialism. Thousands of American soldiers—225,000, to be exact—are stationed in my country and because of this commitment and their loaded guns, we are still a free people.

Where I come from, we still know what freedom means—because seventeen million of us are locked up behind barbed wire, walls and mine fields—behind what amounts to the ugliest and most inhuman border of the world. Some four hundred of my people have been shot and killed because they wanted to go from one part of our country to another.

The American commitment to freedom and the price Americans are paying for that every day saves us from the fate of our neighbors the Czechs who are the victims of imperialism.

Yes—I am prejudiced, and I don't apologize for the fact that I love America.

Yet, I am worried. Recently I talked to officers and soldiers on a big Air Force base in the deep South. I moved around in the most confusing of all American cities, Los Angeles. I had dinner with the president of a big corporation who laid off 80,000 people, and I spent an evening in the home of an old friend who is unemployed now. His two boys are at a university. He makes ends meet by fixing things up in neighboring homes (he is an engineer) and his wife got a job in a shop selling antiques the Americans like so much.

This friend considers himself lucky. A man driving my taxi was not so lucky—seventy dollars a week unemployment compensation. His savings are gone, and he is now cheating by driving a taxi for a few hours every day.

And then I looked at the headlines of the papers—there was a pitched battle in a jail somewhere—another city reports on the dope problem, and in many cities, parents protest busing their children from their neighborhood school to another part of the city to get integrated. No one has been able to explain to me yet this busing scheme.

When I was in this country twenty years ago, the people in whose homes I stayed never locked their doors. This time I was warned not to walk back to the hotel after a concert.

Americans are not very articulate—even though they might talk a great deal. So they leave the forming of their image as a nation to Madison Avenue and to Hollywood. Americans are probably the world's greatest salesmen of material goods, but they are very inept in selling ideas.

Of course, these ideas are all there—in the history of America there are the forces that made America a great country and inspired a dream to peoples all around the world.

There was a time twenty years ago when Americans often got on our nerves because they were so sure of themselves. Now we get nervous because Americans seem to be losing faith in their own destiny, and so a student—what Americans would call a "nice kid"—would in all sincerity talk about U.S. imperialism. That boy—a student in a seminar on current history—and many of his friends don't realize that the problem is exactly the other way around. We have a crisis in the Free World because Americans appear to us to shrink back from the responsibility that goes with being the strongest power in the world. It is clear to us that the Soviets don't have such qualms—and that is why they fill every vacuum America and its allies are leaving. Vietnam, I should think, proves my point. A truly imperialistic power as this "nice kid" believes America to be would have carefully calculated the risk and the price, and then if the price seemed right and the aim worthwhile, it would have gone in with no holds barred.

I know from many conversations in Communist countries that the people there understand that basically freedom is indivisible, and they dream the American dream—not of Coca Cola or two cars in every garage but of freedom as conceived in this country in 1776. Because it is not "American" freedom in a national sense, it is the basis of human dignity everywhere.

When I mingled in the crowd in the airport in San Francisco, I wished I had a way to shake these people to remind them of what they are and to convince them of what we expect from them. Not because they are better or more intelligent perhaps than the people who would crowd the airport in Düsseldorf or Berlin, but because they have in their own heritage the hope of the world. I believe it is the only hope we have—because if America fails, the world fails, and I hope I will not again meet an American who apologizes for the fact that he is American.

TECHNOLOGY ASSESSMENT, A MUST FOR TODAY AND THE FUTURE

Mr. JORDAN of North Carolina. Mr. President, the critical challenges facing America—and indeed all civilization—come not only from our scientific and technological advancements, but from the rapid pace of change we are experiencing. We are unable to respond as quickly and sufficiently as we should to meet the emerging and complex problems threatening the entire earth—the poisoning of our air, land, and water; rapid consumption of our precious—and limited—natural resources; unbridled destruction of our natural environment; wholesale extinction of many forms of animal and plant life; deterioration of our cities and landscapes, erosion of our beaches, the elimination of our wildlife areas; and a general worsening of our human surroundings.

For my part, I do not believe we can accept the dangerous side effects of a "runaway technology" as the price of progress. The costs of pollution and destruction of our natural environment are too high for any of us. If we pay them, we will damage the present and we will lose the future.

The critical and overwhelming paradox between scientific progress and ecological destruction which confronts us today urgently concerns me.

The labor and tools of our scientific and technical communities have helped establish our strong national defense and security system, which in turn has permitted within our Nation, a creative atmosphere for research, development, and innovation. Our progress has allowed us to take a small look into some of the secrets of the universe. As a result we may soon be able to conquer the scourges of disease, poverty, and misfortune that have stalked man since his origins.

We can—and should—take justifiable pride in the remarkable scientific and governmental programs which have yielded the fruits of health and security to vast numbers of our citizens. Our pride in these accomplishments, however, must be tempered by the humility that comes with recognition of the problems that remain in front of us. Through sad experience, we are learning that scientific, technical, and industrial solutions have often resulted in conditions which are worse than the original problems we set out to solve. In short, we are rapidly becoming the victims—not the beneficiaries—of a "runaway technology."

While some of my efforts in this regard have become law, including the National Water Quality Improvement Act of 1970, the Clean Air Amendments of 1970, and the Resource Recovery Act of 1970, I am nonetheless deeply aware that we in Congress have much more to do in order to meet the total array of problems affecting our well-being.

Who makes the vital decisions that affect our lives and universe? As C. P. Snow states in his book "Science and Government":

One of the most bizarre features of any advanced industrial society in our time is that cardinal choices have to be made by a handful of men who cannot have a first-hand knowledge of what those choices depend upon or what their results may be.

We in the Senate must be counted among that "handful of men."

In this regard, our current decision-making processes must be augmented by the creation of a specialized information center that will provide analytical and other information services concerning scientific, technical, economic, and social questions awaiting our attention.

On July 19, 1971, I, therefore, introduced S. 2302, which would establish an Office of Technology Assessment for the Congress. Such an office would assist us in identifying and considering the probable impacts on all of society of those technological applications involved in legislation we are called upon to consider, and answer the "what if" questions that always haunt us.

An Office of Technology Assessment would reduce the dependency of the Congress on the executive bureaucracy and other groups, many of whom have special, vested interest either for or against certain legislation. We need objective, unbiased information on the many complex issues facing us. We desperately require sound alternatives and options, carefully arrived at, which we can consider when legislation is before us. In this regard, we cannot, as legislators, be fully expected to deal specifically, and in detail, with the many complexities posed by rapid technical and scientific progress, unless we first have all the necessary information upon which sound judgments must be made.

We in the Congress have excellent resources at our disposal in the Library of Congress and its Congressional Research Service. We have dedicated, skilled and loyal staffs both in our own offices and attached to those committees on which we serve. However, the sheer magnitude, complexity, and scope of the problems confronting us call for an extremely high volume of sophisticated data to be analyzed and evaluated if we are to make sound and long-range decisions concerning the course of public programs and policies.

Consider the intense debate and controversy surrounding the proposal to develop the super sonic transport—the SST. The Senate required analytical and objective data in order to fully understand and assess the potential impacts of the SST on our environment, our communities, our long-range transportation needs, and our economy. The White House and the Department of Transportation shared some of their research and information with us, but only that which in general favored the SST. I am certain that a great deal of information and interpretative analysis concerning the SST originated from groups and organizations which were not able to share with us the findings of their research and analysis.

We are all aware that the legislative Branch of our Government is not receiving adequate, objective, and timely information concerning the impact of scientific and technological proposals that we are constantly called upon to consider. It is my hope that we will not have to continue to pay the price of this inadequate information flow. Let us heed the warnings already present in our polluted atmosphere and endangered rivers and oceans. Let us act now to halt the depletion of our natural resources and the degradation of the quality of our environment.

A beginning can be made. Senate bill 2302 calls for the Congress to "equip itself with new and effective means" for securing competent, unbiased information concerning the physical, economic, social, and political effects of the applications of technology.

This bill does not call for the creation of another bureaucracy, but for establishment of a desperately needed system for providing timely information and sound alternatives concerning pending legislation for the Congress. I emphasize the term "alternatives."

How often have we been faced with rendering legislative judgments on proposals for which we require alternative considerations, but have had none to consider?

The Office of Technology Assessment that would be created by this bill would provide all of us with the vitally needed assistance and services necessary to assess the short- and long-range effects of the many complex and technical proposals being brought to our attention.

The time is long past when the Senate can afford to forego modern techniques in the areas of information and policy analysis. The tools and talents we urgently require are within our reach. The executive branch and many organizations from the private sector have developed highly sophisticated resources and procedures for acquiring, analyzing, and assessing data. We in Congress should do no less, because the quality—and even survival—of life itself rests in the balance. If we are to be that "handful of men" to make the vital decisions, we must take advantage of the best information available. The establishment of the Office of Technology Assessment would be a most significant step toward providing Congress with this vital information.

DOCK STRIKE

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, on January 28, 1972, the Nashville, Tenn., Banner devoted much of its editorial page to the crippling west coast dock strike. President Nixon's reference to the strike in his state of the Union is carried on this page. You will remember he said:

The Nation is faced with yet another transportation strike which is intolerable . . . and I am determined that we end it at once.

Mr. President, the President needs the help of the Congress. We all know the problem is a severe one and that it should not be swept under a rug. It must be faced. I ask unanimous consent that the lead editorial, "Congress Must Act on Dock Strike" and two adjacent columns, "Nixon Firm" and "Labor Will Fight" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS MUST ACT ON DOCK STRIKE

The dock dispute on the West Coast has been festering for more than a year. A serious economic blow—estimated at $2 billion in losses—has been dealt to the United States by the work stoppage. President Nixon has asked Congress to act quickly on stopgap legislation that would allow federal mediators to step in and dictate a settlement.

To bring an end to this crippling strike, Congress should give swift passage to the measure.

But Congress still is giving President Nixon only half a loaf.

In February of 1970, the President submitted new, comprehensive legislation that would provide the government with broad authority to deal with crippling transportation strikes before they occur, rather than afterwards. That bill has gathered dust in Congressional committees, in spite of the repeated warnings by the administration of the measure's urgency.

On July 1, 1971, the longshoremen went out on strike. This halted all shipping on the West Coast and triggered economic crises in industry after industry, all of them innocent bystanders.

The strike brought a significant drop in exports, threatened a permanent loss of foreign markets, torpedoed our balance of trade and accounted for a decrease in farm prices. With the West Coast docks paralyzed, wheat and corn overflowed grain elevators and backed up on barges on the Mississippi River.

The strike is costing the 24 West Coast ports an estimated $24 million daily in cargo.

The longshoremen struck for 100 days last year while collective bargaining foundered.

During that time, American farmers lost face with one of their most attractive foreign markets, Japan, which buys more than $1 billion in agricultural imports. President Nixon has warned that Japan is concerned over the constant danger of a dock strike and is trimming its dependence on American exports.

When the dock strike began again nine days ago, Japan confirmed their economic withdrawal by ordering 8.7 million bushels of wheat from Canada and Australia and only 1.6 million bushels from the United States.

The stubborn attitude of longshoremen leaders is noted elsewhere on this page today. Their refusal to settle the strike requires emergency action by the Congress.

The nation needs this legislation; moreover, it needs the comprehensive tools to deal with national emergency strikes in advance. President Nixon has given Congress a way to deal with this problem. The time has come for Congress to quit sitting on its hands.

NIXON FIRM
(By Alice Widener)

NEW YORK CITY.—President Nixon is entirely right in asking Congress for special legislation to halt the "intolerable" West Coast dock strike. It is intolerable. It cost thousands of people their jobs. It has cost companies millions upon millions of dollars. It has halted American exports abroad and barred much-needed imports from abroad.

The West Coast dock strike epitomizes the truth of what a top economic adviser to the West European Common Market told me last year:

"You Americans pride yourselves on championing democracy, but you tolerate in your country the most powerful dictatorship in the world, the dictatorship of the Big Labor union bosses. Their rule is more absolute than that of any absolute monarch in long past history and that of any Communist or Fascist ruler in recent history."

For much too long, radical Leftist, pro-Communist Harry Renton Bridges—whom Damon Stetson of the New York Times recently described as a "lean, hawk-faced Australian-born agitator who plunged San Francisco into an agonizing general strike in 1934"—has ruled West Coast docks with a relentless anti-capitalist hand.

Over the years there has been many Congressional investigations of Harry Bridges' radical Leftist political connections. It is now alleged that he no longer is a fiery revolutionary. Perhaps he isn't. But he certainly is as destructively despotic as if he still were. It is said now that "rebellious, militant ideologues" in his own union are threatening Mr. Bridges' leadership. This may be true. But who put these militants hating American free enterprise and seeking to destroy it into their high posts within the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union? Bridges did.

It happens that my daughter is employed in a Los Angeles firm that has been forced to discharge hundreds of employees because of the dock strike. The company has lost millions of dollars due to the strike. The company's stock has declined in value as a result of several hundred thousand investors and pensioners have been very adversely affected. How can President Nixon help to increase employment and better economic conditions if he is balked in both attempts by militant Leftists eager to "bring down the system" regardless of how many people get hurt?

In the 1940's, our government tried to deport Harry Bridges from our country as a Communist. As in so many similar cases, unfortunately, Bridges won and our government lost, leaving Bridges free to enjoy all the American liberties he held in utter contempt.

Though Communists pretend to be friends of labor while seeking to gain absolute power they immediately rob labor of all power, including the right to strike, as soon as they control a government. There is no right to strike in the Soviet Union, Red China or any other Socialist country.

Recently big labor boss George Meany suddenly revealed his true concept of himself as a man so big he could be rude, crude and boorish to an invited guest, the President of the United States. An indignant public cut Meany down to size and he is through as a figure of any significant influence in American affairs be they Democratic or Republican.

Now Harry Bridges and his fellow militant ideologues are defiantly trying to halt our economic recovery and need to be cut down to size. They too have revealed themselves for what they really are and public opinion will no longer tolerate their destructive "shut it all down" wrecking operation.

Americans everywhere ought to write or wire their representatives in Congress to blast Bridges & Company.

LABOR WILL FIGHT
(By Victor Riesel)

WASHINGTON.—Two hours before President Nixon drove up the Hill with his State of the Union message, he swiftly scrawled some words into the script—words which will become one of the truly eruptive issues of this Presidential campaign.

"The nation cannot and will not tolerate that kind of irresponsible labor tieup in the future," he wrote, referring to Harry Bridges' harassing West Coast longshore waterfront paralysis.

The next day, after applying hydraulic personal pressure on Secretary of Labor Hodgson, to whip up a written remedy in 24 rather than 72 hours, Mr. Nixon demanded Congressional power to force a settlement.

And AFL-CIO President George Meany, now back on virtually full cigar- and Nixon-chewing schedule in his eighth-floor office, decided the labor movement would become the immovable object in the way of what traditionally has been Presidential irresistible force.

"We will fight it all the way," said one of Meany's colleagues—a fully authorized source—referring to Mr. Nixon's ultra-emergency demand for Congress to empower him to ask Labor Secretary Hodgson to appoint a three-man arbitration board to dictate a settlement.

"We will not buy compulsory arbitration against anyone, any place for any reason. The fact that it is aimed at Harry Bridges makes no difference. It is consistent with the policy the federal (AFL-CIO) always has taken. And we're also opposed to his other proposed legislation for the long haul."

This was a jab at what President Nixon now has begun calling the Crippling Strikes Prevention Act, on which he said Congress has been dragging its feet for two years.

And for full measure, the labor federation will oppose confirmation of Judge George (Gid) Boldt as Pay Board chairman. So phase two of the Battle of Bal Harbour continues. Once more Meany, now well rested, and Mr. Nixon will go eyeball to eyeball.

Meany's war cry is they shall not pass—neither the one-shot legislation aimed at the West Coast longshoremen nor the broader bill which would affect all transport by subjecting transportation strikes to final and binding arbitration. Meany always counts the votes before he moves and presumably he believes he has the votes in the Congress and on its key labor committees to checkmate the President.

This confrontation could determine how many votes Mr. Nixon or Meany's candidate gets in November—which is the final and binding count for the career of each of these powerful men.

There's some obvious political skimming here for the President. Again it is he against the cigar-chomping curmudgeon and the labor troops. It is he—Mr. Nixon—who is championing the farmers whose grain has wasted and rotted in fields, small town streets and over-spilled silos. And he can show that he has gone all the way including talking to the 70-year-old Bridges face to face.

It was Bridges who said, a few minutes after the President demanded compulsory arbitration legislation, "Any legislation proposed by the President will not settle the strike." Meaning, of course, that Harry, a little more polished than in the old bloody Embarcadero general strike days, was telling the Congress and the President where to go.

But the President is uptight on this one for other than political reasons. As one of his intimates said the other day when asked why the President had scrawled the anti-strike words into the State of the Union speech—which was extraordinarily unusual:

"Well, every time it looked like we might have a settlement—which Bridges once said we'd have in a week—it would blow. This could have serious long-range effects not only on the economy in California but across the nation. We were just showing recovery from aerospace layoffs. This is a critical moment. Unemployment there is over 6 percent. Everybody is getting hurt."

THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION AND THE INDIVIDUAL

Mr. PROXMIER. Mr. President, some people oppose American ratification of the Genocide Convention because they believe that the Convention's definition of the word "genocide" dangerously distorts the true meaning of the term. They maintain that article II of the treaty would require each signatory to prosecute any person demonstrating the intent to destroy or harm a single member of a specified ethnic, racial, or religious group. This mandate they consider too broad.

However, this concern is unwarranted. First, article II of the treaty rather explicitly states that only the intent to destroy the "whole" or part of such groups would require Government action. In 1950 Deputy Under Secretary of State Dean Rusk drew the distinction between crimes of genocide and homicide by noting that the former designated the intent for large-scale violence against members of a specific group while actions against one or two members of a racial or ethnic group would fall in the latter category.

Furthermore, ratification of the Genocide Convention would not increase the number of prosecutions for violence against individuals because the U.S. legal system already considers such violent actions to be criminal offenses. Violence and persecution in any form has long been abhorrent to those upholding the principles of freedom and democracy for all men. Ratification of this document would merely reaffirm our commitment to those principles. After more than 20 years of debate such a reaffirmation is more important than ever.

Finally, the Convention allows for each nation in agreement to devise implementing legislation consistent with the constitutions of those nations. This provision would allow the United States to make a stand of moral opposition to genocide while maintaining criminal statutes against homicide and discrimination.

Mr. President, I ask the Senate to ratify the Genocide Convention as quickly as possible, and make clear America's position against mass violence.

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO LAW PROFESSOR OPPOSES EQUAL RIGHTS FOR WOMEN AMENDMENT

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, one of the Nation's most outstanding law professors, Philip B. Kurland, professor of law at the University of Chicago Law School and editor of the Supreme Court Review testified last year before the House Judiciary Committee in opposition to the equal rights for women amendment.

In his statement, Professor Kurland maintains that adequate authority now exists for the legislatures of the States and Congress to pass legislation "that is directed to specific evils and effective administration of that legislation will be far more effective in accomplishing the purpose of eliminating invidious discrimination." I agree with Professor Kurland and I think that the advocates of the equal rights amendment could make much better use of their time in bringing forth specific proposals before Congress and the State legislatures that would be designed to correct specific areas of discrimination against them.

Professor Kurland finds a great deal wrong with the fact that the equal rights amendment could be interpreted to abolish all legal differences in the treatment of men and women. Professor Kurland called this "a demand for unisex by constitutional mandate." And, with simple clarity, Professor Kurland explains what is wrong with the unisex amendment. He said:

There are physiological and biological differences between men and women that are not subject to eradication even by constitutional amendment.

Professor Kurland discusses in detail one very practical problem which could be caused by the passage of the equal rights amendment. I sincerely hope that each Senator, before voting on the equal rights amendment, will think about this problem. Professor Kurland has this to say:

Times have changed in such a way that it may well be possible for the generation of women now coming to maturity to surrender all special legal protection and privileges. A great majority of them have had all the opportunities for education and training afforded to their male peers, with an expectation of full opportunities to put that education and training to the same use as their male peers. They may well be able to succeed in a competitive society in which all differences in legal rights between men and women were wiped out. There remains, however, a very large part of the female population on whom the imposition of such a constitutional standard could be disastrous. There is no doubt that society permitted these women to come to maturity not as competitors with males but rather as the bearers and raisers of their children and the keeper of their homes. There are a multitude of women who still find fulfillment in this role. This may be unfortunate in the eyes of some; it remains a fact. It can boast no label of equality now to treat the older generations as if they were their own children or grandchildren. Nor can women be regarded as unified in their desire for this change. Certainly the desire to open opportunities to some of them can be achieved without the price of removal of the protection of others.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Professor Kurland's statement be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY PHILIP B. KURLAND, PROFESSOR OF LAW, THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

I am grateful to the committee for its invitation to express my views on the subject of a proposed constitutional amendment to provide "equal rights for women." I am not sure that I have any contribution to make to a subject that has received such extensive attention by the Congress over a period of almost 50 years now.

Indeed, I have but two points to make to this committee on the subject. First, I do not believe that a constitutional amendment is either necessary or appropriate to alleviate the very real discriminations suffered today by women in American society. I say this for two reasons. The discriminations from which women suffer in our society are essentially not those imposed by laws of either national or local governments. I submit, too, that legislation, for which Congress and the States already have ample authority, that is directed to specific evils and effective administration of that legislation will be far more effective in accomplishing the purpose of eliminating invidious discrimination.

My second proposition is that if such an amendment is to be proposed by Congress, its aims and purposes ought to be clearly delineated, either in the language of the amendment or by the reports of the committees recommending the amendment to the respective houses of Congress. Congress should particularly indicate whether it is fostering a "unisex" approach or one that bars only invidious discrimination against women. They are not the same, however much some of the sponsors of the proposed amendments would like them appear to be the same.

At the risk of trying to teach my grandmother to suck eggs, I should like to begin by referring to the tortured history of the proposed amendment.

I. SOME LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

Last year, some 47 years after it was first proposed in Congress, a joint resolution to initiate an equal rights amendment was sprung from the grasp of this committee, rushed through the House after a debate of less than 1 hour, and failed of endorsement in the Senate by a whisker. The 1923 version was put simply and ambiguously: "Men and women shall have equal rights throughout the United States and in every place subject to its jurisdiction. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." Obviously, the language so chosen was rife with problems of appropriate construction. The 1970 language, in a form that has essentially been used for the last 15 years or so, and repeated in the proposed resolutions under consideration here today, afforded different, but no less challenging, ambiguities. It reads:

"Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex. Congress and the several States shall have power, within their respective jurisdictions, to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

The proposal for an equal rights amendment obviously had not lain dormant between 1923 and 1970. After the initial impetus provided by the suffragettes, it emerged again in the period following the Second World War, during which much of what had therefore been considered men's work was ably performed by women. Indeed, in the years 1942, 1944, 1946, 1948, 1950, 1952, 1953, 1956, and 1962, the Senate Committee on the Judiciary had reported favorably on essentially the same proposal as that under consideration in 1970. And, in 1950 and 1953, the Senate had approved those resolutions with the votes of 63 to 19 and 73 to 11, respectively. There was, therefore some irony in the fact that the proposal that had in the past succeeded in the Senate but languished in the House of Representatives should, in 1970, have met its doom in "the other body" after passage in the House of Representatives.

There is an explanation for this. The Senate had not in fact changed its position in the interim. The two successful Senate forays, in 1950 and 1953, had been accomplished only after the proposal had been amended by Senator Hayden's language, which appended the following: "The provisions of this article shall not be construed to impair any rights, benefits or exemptions conferred by law upon persons of the female sex." Had the proponents of the 1970 proposal taken cognizance of this history and accepted the conditions of the Hayden qualifications, I venture that the proposal would have again readily secured Senate acquiescence. The refusal by some protagonists to accept the qualification was probably not, however, inadvertent; it was calculated. It represented a deliberate choice between two different objectives, either but not both of which the proposed amendment might fully serve.

II. CONSTRUCTION AND RECONSTRUCTION

Mr. Justice Frankfurter once told us: "Legislation has an aim; it seeks to obviate some mischief, to supply an inadequacy, to effectuate a change of policy, to formulate a plan of government. That aim, that policy is not drawn, like nitrogen, out of the air; it is evinced in the language of the statute, as read in the light of other external manifestations of purpose. That is what the judge must seek and effectuate, and he ought not to be led off the trail by tests that have overtones of subjective design." If it is the duty of the judiciary to effectuate the aim of legislation, it is no less the duty of the legislature, to the best of its capacity, to make clear what its aims are. It ought to say what mischief it wishes to obviate, what inadequacy it wants to supply, what change of policy it desires to effectuate, or what the plan of government is that it is seeking to formulate. If it is an act of usurpation for the judiciary to read legislation to effect its own aims and purposes, it is an act of abdication for the legislature to fail to state its purposes and aims in framing the legislative act that it promulgates.

The prime difficulty with the proposed 1970 equal rights amendment was that the National Legislature came close to approval of constitutional legislation without defining—without knowing?—its aims and purposes. This is not a lawyer's cavil. It was a defect so patent that newspaper editorial writers could see it. Thus, the New York Times wrote:

"Equal rights for women is a proposition so unarguable in principle and so long overdue in practice that it is a pity to have it approached by the House of Representatives as an exercise in political opportunism. For 47 years that body regularly rejected out of hand all proposals for a women's rights amendment to the Constitution. Now it approves, without committee hearings and after only an hour's debate, a constitutional change of almost mischievous ambiguity."

The Times itself was guilty of compounding the confusion, for it fell into the trap of thinking that equal rights and women's rights are necessarily descriptive of the same legislative objectives. It is of the essence of the problem that frequently they are not. And so there is merit in its desire for elimination of almost mischievous ambiguity, just as there is merit in the editorial proposal of the Wall Street Journal: "Well, we're all for the ladies, but even so, before we write some new words into the Constitution it would be nice to know what they really do mean."

A. A basic conflict of purpose

The primary problem of construction offered by the proposed equal rights amendment derives from the fact that the movement for women's rights is Janus-faced. The proposed amendment presented one aspect, while much of its support was voiced in terms of its other visage. The first would command the treatment of men and women as if there were no differences between them, even at the price of removing protections and benefits that have otherwise been afforded to females. It was a demand for unisex by constitutional mandate. And much of the benefit of such a proposal, to the extent it was possible to effectuate it, would inure to males rather than females, since equality may be attained by applying to all the rules that had theretofore been applied only to females, such as a lower age of emancipation, no legal obligation of family support, exemption from military service.

The second attitude sought only the elimination of discrimination against women, a ban on treating females as a disabled class. Legislation purporting to afford—and in fact affording—privileges to women that were not also available to men would not run afoul of such constitutional provision. The difference is essentially the difference between the amendment without the qualifying Hayden language, and with it. And herein lies the conflict among those who would support some constitutional amendment to abate the legal incapacities of women, certainly a sufficient majority of both the House and the Senate to promulgate a proposed amendment if they could but agree on its purpose and function.

There are some basic difficulties with the unisex approach, not the least of which is that there are physiological and biological differences between men and women that are not subject to eradication even by constitutional amendment. Practically, of course, this may present no difficulties for the very reason that nature cannot be subjected to human laws while humans must bow to the laws of nature. The essential claim for such a declaration of equality of the sexes is its symbolic value. The temper of our times demands instant and simplistic answers to complex problems. And it is this temper that assumes that the cure for such problems lies in the incantation of the word "equality" by our highest governmental means, the Constitution, or by the voice of the Constitution, the Supreme Court of the United States. Without denying the importance of symbols, it is necessary to recognize that when they are only the creatures of the Constitution, thus far at least, their effect has been less than pervasive.

A second difficulty with a constitutional mandate of instant equality of the sexes is that proffered by history. Times have changed in such a way that it may well be possible for the generation of women now coming to maturity to surrender all special legal protection and privileges. A great majority of them have had all the opportunities for education and training afforded to their male peers, with an expectation of full opportunities to put that education and training to the same use as their male peers. They may well be able to succeed in a competitive society in which all differences in legal rights between men and women were wiped out. There remains, however, a very large part of the female population on whom the imposition of such a constitutional standard could be disastrous. There is no doubt that society permitted these women to come to maturity not as competitors with males but rather as the bearers and raisers of their children and the keeper of their homes. There are a multitude of women who still find fulfillment in this role. This may be unfortunate in the eyes of some; it remains a fact. It can boast no label of equality now to treat the older generations as if they were their own children or grandchildren. Nor can women be regarded as unified in their desire for this change. Certainly the desire to open opportunities to some of them can be achieved without the price of removal of the protection of others.

On the other hand there are also difficulties in an amendment that does not ban all legislative distinctions in treatment of men and women, that would leave unchallenged those laws that purported to confer, in Senator Hayden's language, "rights, benefits or exemptions * * * upon persons of the female sex." The question when a statute confers a benefit rather than imposing a disability is often difficult of answer. The most cited example of the problem are those laws that provide for minimum wages, maximum hours, limitations on night work, and requirements of sanitary conditions for women workers. Certainly since Louis D. Brandeis fought for the validity of such legislation, it has been assumed by right-thinking people that the legislation was for the benefit of women.

Classical economists, on the other hand, are clear that such laws put women at a competitive disadvantage in the employment market. A Department of Labor study, however, purported to show that there was no difference in women's employment between those States that have laws providing minimum wages or banning night work and those that didn't and only a very small difference between the States that banned women's overtime work and those that did not. This sort of question, whether the legislation affords privilege or imposes disability, however, may be one appropriate or judicial resolution on a case by case basis, with the results dependent on the facts adduced and the values assigned to them.

B. The problem of equality

If an amendment were passed that in effect prohibited all legislative classification in terms of sex, the results might not be desirable but the problems of construction would be minimal. The judicial answers could be mechanical and, therefore, easy. The difficulty is that not even the sponsors of such a unisex amendment have made the claim for rigid classification. Apparently embarrassed by the prospect of the abolition of such existent requirements as separate toilet facilities for men and women or the availability of maternity leaves, proponents of the equal rights amendment asserted that certain distinctions could continue to be maintained, so long as the principle of equality is assured. The concept of equality is not, however, one that is easily defined or confined.

The phrase "equal rights" might be repeated an infinite number of times without providing additional guidance to the speaker or listener. Mr. Justice Cardozo noted some time ago that "a great principle of constitutional law is not susceptible of comprehensive statement in an adjective." And it was almost a century ago that Sir James Fitzjames Stephen asserted that "equality is a word so wide and vague as to be by itself almost unmeaning." Nothing that has happened in the intervening years has done anything to make it more specific.

There are suggestions in some of Mr. Justice Frankfurter's opinions to mark the perimeter of a constitutional notion of equality that have an appeal, if only to a small audience. In Whitney v. Tax Commission, he pointed out that: "The equal protection clause was not designed to compel uniformity in the face of difference." And, in the same term of Court, he announced in Tigner v. Texas: "The Constitution does not require things which are different in fact or opinion to be treated by the law as though they were the same." It was also his view that "there is no greater inequality than the equal treatment of unequals." Applying these notions in the context of the equal rights amendment, one might work out some generalizations. Governmental distinction between males and females would have to be justified in fact before it could pass muster under the proposed amendment. If the distinction were based on reason, then the legislation should be presumptively valid. The mere fact that there are two sexes should not be reason in itself for distinguishing between them in legislation. On the other hand, the mere fact that a distinction was drawn between them ought not to suffice to invalidate the law. I should think that appropriate data of sociological conditions, especially those deriving from a history of different treatment of the sexes, might warrant the continuance of certain benefits and protections. This should certainly be true of laws relating to domestic relations where marriage contracts were made under laws that created certain expectations or obligations of one spouse to the other, including the male's obligation to support not only his wife but his children as well.

C. The Equal Protection Clause

Such a construction necessarily raises the question whether the equal protection clause of the 14th amendment does not already afford all that the proposal equal rights amendment would offer. The difficulty is that the other informed answer must be that it probably does, but we have no definitive construction by the Supreme Court to give us adequate assurance. Certainly there are cases in the past that raise some doubts that this notion of nondiscrimination on the ground of sex has yet been constitutionally established. Certainly Breedlove v. Suttles, Goesart v. Cleary, and Holt v. Florida, to the extent that they are still viable precedents, do not make it clear that classification by sex is yet regarded, under the 14th amendment, as a "suspect classification" like those of race or religion.

On the other hand, there can be little doubt that the 14th amendment together with the Commerce clause give more than adequate authority to the national legislature to ban discrimination on the basis of sex. And the 1964 Civil Rights Act affords ample evidence that the power can be utilized where the legislature finds that such invidious discrimination needs extirpation.

The scope of the 14th amendment as a direct restraint on Government action still reveals some ambiguities, however, that would also trouble the proposed equal rights amendment. To what extent is the constitutional ban to be read as one against State action only? When is individual action to be treated as State action? And to what degree does the constitutional ban on discrimination authorize legislation providing for "reverse discrimination" or "benign quotas?" If a new amendment does not—and it is not likely that it will—reveal the answers to these questions in its language, it would be helpful to its proper construction to know from the legislative history what Congress thought to be the proper answer to these questions. As of now, the entire legislative history—from 1923 to 1970—is less than enlightening on these subjects.

I tend to believe that an equal rights amendment would be more important for its enabling clause than for its direct substantive effect, especially if the "unisex" construction were not adopted. And such an enabling clause would certainly add little to what is already provided by the 14th amendment and the Commerce clause. Today, the area of governmentally compelled or sanctioned discrimination against women is very limited and is growing smaller all the time. It should be noted, for example, that some of the primary planks of the "women's liberation" platform, such as the right to abortion, or to "child care centers," would be totally unaffected by the proposed amendment even in its "unisex" version.

III. CONCLUSION

I come back to the point at which I started. I don't think that the controversy over the proposed amendment goes to the question whether invidious discrimination against women should be eliminated, but rather to the question of the appropriate means for accomplishing that objective. If the answer is to be by amendment, which I regard as unnecessary because the legislative power that it would confer already exists, the amendment should be something more than a license to the judiciary to create that kind of amendment that Congress was itself unable to frame. Congress should, at least, choose between a proposal that would purport to say that there are no differences between men and women that are cognizable by law and its alternative that would seek to protect women against discrimination.

THE SPACE SHUTTLE

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, President Nixon has recently committed this Nation to a new goal in the continuing challenge of space exploration. I refer, of course, to the decision to develop the space shuttle as an economic means of increasing the potential use of space. I have no doubt that this decision will certainly rank with another Presidential decision of 11 years ago that committed our scientific and industrial resources to a manned lunar landing, and I applaud the President's foresight and initiative.

The space shuttle, as the name implies, will permit us to go into space frequently and relatively easily. Dale D. Myers, Associate Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration estimates that the shuttle cost will be about a quarter of that for the Apollo program. Additionally, Mr. Myers points out that the technology required for the shuttle for the most part is already present. Thus, Apollo and the shuttle complement each other, the latter building upon the technical accomplishments of the former to increase many times the benefits available from space.

The space shuttle will allow us to explore the mysteries of space at a fraction of the present cost. Because it is reusable, the shuttle will reduce the cost of payloads going into space to less than $100, as compared to $15,000 per pound for small payloads to $1,000 per pound for large payloads currently. It will also reduce costs in another way. Since it can place satellites and other payloads into orbit, this Nation's number of conventional launch vehicles can be drastically reduced. We are learning to use satellites in global monitoring and management of natural resources, as well as agricultural applications and pollution control. Soon these versatile tools will guide aircraft and bring televised education to remote areas of the world. But these possibilities and others like them with direct bearing on human betterment cannot be fully realized so long as every orbited satellite is the result of massive effort and tremendous cost. Space shuttle will solve these problems. Clearly, it is a wise investment in the future.

Our expenditures in space are significant, but yet in 1972 this Nation will spend only 1.4 percent of its total budget on space, including the development of the space shuttle. This, I believe is a small price to pay for the invaluable return we receive in knowledge. Space, like any frontier is initially costly to explore. But this exploration promises to unlock untold secrets, and it is up to the space shuttle to carve the broad highways through the heavens, bringing the benefits of space to all mankind.

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, section 133B of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended by the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1970, requires that each committee publish its rules in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD not later than March 1 each year.

In accordance with that section, I ask unanimous consent that the rules of the Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the rules were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RULES OF COMMITTEE ON BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS

[Adopted in executive session, March 11, 1971]

RULE 1.—REGULAR MEETING DATE FOR COMMITTEE

The regular meeting day for the Committee to transact its business shall be the last Tuesday in each month; except that if the Committee has met at any time during the month prior to the last Tuesday of the month, the regular meeting of the Committee may be cancelled at the discretion of the Chairman.

RULE 2.—COMMITTEE INVESTIGATIONS

(a) No investigation shall be initiated by the Committee unless the Senate or the full Committee has specifically authorized such investigation.

Hearings

(b) No hearing of the Committee shall be scheduled outside the District of Columbia except by agreement between the Chairman and the Committee and the ranking minority member of the Committee or by a majority vote of the Committee.

Confidential testimony

(c) No confidential testimony taken or confidential material presented at an executive session of the Committee or any report of the proceedings of such executive session shall be made public either in whole or in part or by way of summary, unless specifically authorized by the Chairman of the Committee and the ranking minority member of the Committee or by a majority vote of the Committee.

Interrogation of witnesses

(d) Committee interrogation of a witness shall be conducted only by members of the Committee or such professional staff as is authorized by the Chairman or the ranking minority member of the Committee.

RULE 3.—SUBCOMMITTEES

Authorization for

(a) A subcommittee of the Committee may be authorized only by the action of a majority of the Committee.

Membership

(b) Membership to subcommittees shall be by nomination of the Chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee and shall be approved by the majority vote of the Committee.

Investigations

(c) No investigation shall be initiated by a subcommittee unless the Senate or the full Committee has specifically authorized such investigation.

Hearings

(d) No hearing of a subcommittee shall be scheduled outside the District of Columbia without prior consultation with the Chairman and then only by agreement between the Chairman of the Subcommittee and the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee or by a majority vote of the Committee.

Confidential testimony

(e) No confidential testimony taken or confidential material presented at an executive session of the Subcommittee or any report of the proceedings of such executive session shall be made public, either in whole or in part or by way of summary, unless specifically authorized by the Chairman of the Subcommittee and the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee or by a majority vote of the Subcommittee.

Interrogation of witnesses

(f) Subcommittee interrogation of a witness shall be conducted only by members of the Subcommittee or such professional staff as is authorized by the Chairman or the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee.

Special meetings

(g) If at least three members of a subcommittee desire that a special meeting of the Subcommittee be called by the Chairman of the Subcommittee, those members may file in the offices of the Committee their written request to the Chairman of the Subcommittee for that special meeting. Immediately upon the filing of the request, the Clerk of the Committee shall notify the Chairman of the Subcommittee of the filing of the request. If, within three calendar days after the filing of the request, the Chairman of the Subcommittee does not call the requested special meeting, to be held within seven calendar days after the filing of the request, a majority of the members of the Subcommittee may file in the offices of the Committee their written notice that a special meeting of the Subcommittee will be held, specifying the date and hour of that special meeting. The Subcommittee shall meet on that date and hour. Immediately upon the filing of the notice, the Clerk of the Committee shall notify all members of the Subcommittee that such special meeting will be held and inform them of its date and hour. If the Chairman of the Subcommittee is not present at any regular, additional, or special meeting of the Subcommittee, the ranking member of the majority party on the Subcommittee who is present shall preside at that meeting.

RULE 4.—WITNESSES

Filing of statements

(a) Any witness appearing before the Committee or Subcommittee (including any witness representing a Government agency) must file with the Committee or Subcommittee before noon on the day preceding his appearance 75 copies of his statement to the Committee or Subcommittee. In the event that the witness fails to file a written statement in accordance with this rule, the Chairman of the Committee or Subcommittee has the discretion to deny the witness the privilege of testifying before the Committee or Subcommittee until the witness has properly complied with the rule.

Length of statements

(b) Written statements properly filed with the Committee or Subcommittee may be as lengthy as the witness desires and may contain such documents or other addenda as the witness feels is necessary to present properly his views to the Committee or Subcommittee. It shall be left to the discretion of the Chairman of the Committee or Subcommittee as to what portion of the documents presented to the Committee or Subcommittee shall be published in the printed transcript of the hearings.

Fifteen-minute duration

(c) Oral statements of witnesses shall be based upon their filed statements but shall be limited to 15 minutes duration. This period may be extended at the discretion of the Chairman presiding at the hearings.

(d) Witnesses may be subpoenaed by the Chairman of the Committee or a subcommittee with the agreement of the ranking minority member of the Committee or Subcommittee or by a majority vote of the Committee or Subcommittee.

Counsel permitted

(e) Any witness subpoenaed by the Committee or Subcommittee to a public or executive hearing may be accompanied by counsel of his own choosing who shall be permitted, while the witness is testifying, to advise him of his legal rights.

Expenses of witnesses

(f) No witness shall be reimbursed for his appearance at a public or executive hearing before the Committee or Subcommittee unless such reimbursement is agreed to by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee or by a majority vote of the Committee.

Limits of questioning

(g) Questioning of a witness by members shall be limited to 10 minutes duration, except that if a member is unable to finish his questioning in the 10 minute period, he may be permitted further questions of the witness after all members have been given an opportunity to question the witness.

Additional opportunity to question a witness shall be limited to a duration of 10 minutes until all members have been given the opportunity of questioning the witness for a second time. This 10 minute time period per member will be continued until all members have exhausted their questions of the witness.

RULE 5.—VOTING

Vote to report a measure or matter

No measure or matter shall be reported from the Committee unless a majority of the Committee are actually present. The vote of the Committee to report a measure or matter shall require the concurrence of a majority of the members of the Committee who are present.

Any absent member may affirmatively request that his vote to report a matter be cast by proxy. The proxy shall be sufficiently clear to identify the subject matter, and to inform the Committee as to how the member wishes his vote to be recorded thereon. By written notice to the Chairman any time before the record vote on the measure or matter concerned is taken, any member may withdraw a proxy previously given. All proxies shall be kept in the files of the Committee, along with the record of the roll call vote of the members present and voting, as an official record of the vote on the measure or matter.

Vote on matters other than a report on a measure or matter

On committee matters other than the vote to report a measure or matter, a member of the Committee may request that his vote may be cast by proxy.

RULE 6.—QUORUM

Unless the Committee otherwise provides or is required by the Rules of the Senate, one member shall constitute a quorum for the receipt of evidence, the swearing of witnesses, and the taking of testimony.

RULE 7.—STAFF PRESENT ON DAIS

Only members and the Clerk of the Committee shall be permitted on the dais during public or executive hearings, except that a member may have one staff person accompany him during such public or executive hearing on the dais. If a member desires a second staff person to accompany him on the dais he must make a request to the Chairman for that purpose.

BUSINESS BEHIND THE IRON CURTAIN

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, during a trade mission to Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia, the Director of the U.S. Department of Commerce Field Office in Pittsburgh, Lewis E. Conman, discovered that even top Communist officials have a genuine interest and curiosity about Americans.

Specifically, Mr. Conman says the Communist countries are interested in establishing trade relations with the United States. Conman says:

A host of different kinds of products would sell behind the Iron Curtain.

Pursuing this subject in the Pittsburgh Press, William H. Wylie, business editor, has written an interesting and informative article which I commend to Senators and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THERE'S BUSINESS BEHIND IRON CURTAIN, CITY FIRMS TOLD

(By William H. Wylie)

Has 25 years of anti-American propaganda poisoned the minds of people living behind the Iron Curtain?

Apparently not, according to Lewis E. Conman, director of the U.S. Department of Commerce Field Office in Pittsburgh.

He recently led a 15-day trade mission to Poland, Hungary and Czechoslovakia.

Conman related an episode that shows even top Communist officials sometimes have their "capitalistic foibles."

He said he was attending a very serious, top-level meeting sponsored by the Czech Trade Ministry in Prague. During a lull in the session, a Czech official turned to Conman and inquired:

"Who won the World Series this year?"

Surprised, Conman quickly brought the Czech up to date on the Pirates' No. 1 achievement in 1971 and asked, "How do you know about the World Series?"

"I was assigned to the Czech Consulate in Chicago for 12 years and became quite a Cub fan," the Czech explained. His next question was "where did the Cubs finish this year?"

Conman wasn't sure and told the Czech he thought they landed in third or fourth place—not bad information, considering the Chicagoans tied with the Mets for third place in the National League's Eastern Division.

Actually, baseball is incidental to this yarn. The point is that people in Iron Curtain countries are interested in Americans and want to do business with us, Conman said.

Dust from Soviet tanks that crushed the Czech insurrection has long since settled. Now a strictly-business attitude prevails, Conman said, and American businessmen are being edged out by other nations.

"The Japanese are everywhere," he said, "and the Germans, who are practically next door, are after the business, too."

Other European countries—England, France, Austria and Spain—are equally aggressive.

Nevertheless, Conman said the Czechs, Poles and Hungarians expressed genuine interest in American products and asked "Why don't the U.S. companies call on us?"

Evidently American business is losing by default. No real effort has been made to get business behind the Iron Curtain, Conman said.

The purpose of the trade mission was to change all this. Besides the Commerce Department official, representatives of six instrument manufacturers went along.

The initial payoff was impressive—$900,000 sales over the next 24 months. It cost the federal government $4,000 and the companies picked up their tab.

Although none of the instrument companies is located in Western Pennsylvania, the door is open to similar missions by local firms, Conman said. The Commerce Department sponsors approximately 40 missions a year.

A host of different kinds of products would "sell" behind the Iron Curtain, Conman said. Local firms manufacturing high-technology goods would have the best crack at these markets.

The export control list—once a barrier to trade with the socialist nations—is being trimmed, he continued. The door is open to many items once forbidden.

Demand is strong for electrical and non-electrical machinery, building materials, chemicals, crude petroleum, transportation equipment and pharmaceuticals.

Conman reported keen interest in American packaging techniques, mainly for food products. Office machines, especially computers and copiers, are a hot item, too.

And it's a big market—in the $8-$10 billion range in total. At present American companies are getting less than 2 per cent of it. Russia, of course, dominates with about 30 per cent.

Current U.S. exports to the three countries are mainly raw materials or farm products.

The Export-Import Bank is not permitted to finance trade with Poland, Czechoslovakia or Hungary, but the rules may be changed next year. Anyway, financing is no problem, Conman said. It can be arranged through banks in the foreign nations.

There's already a "U.S. flavor" in the Iron Curtain countries. Conman said while he was in Poland Coca-Cola and Pepsi-Cola negotiated contracts to distribute their products there. And Heinz products were on the tables "everywhere we went," he added.

A HAVEN FROM PERSECUTION

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I rise today to speak in support of those proposals which have recently been introduced in the Congress to provide additional funds for the resettlement of Soviet Jews in Israel. I have repeatedly urged that our Government take an initiative in this direction and to work relentlessly to pressure the Soviet Union to end its persecution of Jews and other minorities in the Soviet Union. I have cosponsored several pieces of legislation which urge the President to take appropriate action and I intend to cosponsor the legislation now placed before the Senate. This legislation should receive the unanimous support of the Congress because of the basic humanitarian concern to which it addresses itself.

There are approximately 3 million Jews in the Soviet Union and they are not allowed to live a life free from religious, social, and political persecution. Many who have contributed a great deal to their country have been forced out of their jobs; their children are deprived of an education; and the elderly are left uncared for. Their lives are an all too chilling echo of the past, a past which the United States committed American lives, and treasure to rectify. We worked to build the United Nations just to avoid the human suffering and indignity that tainted the history of our civilization. The Senate now has before it the Genocide Convention which is designed to make acts of genocide an international crime. It is shameful to think that there could be any hesitation in this great Chamber to ratify such a treaty. I urge that the Senate consider it as a first priority. There is the United Nations Declaration on Human Rights which outlines a basic and universal standard of human liberties, an international bill of rights.

Against a backdrop of world law, there have been frequent instances, all too frequent I am afraid, of abuse of the law.

Persecution of the Jews in the Soviet Union is the most flagrant example we have today of crimes against humanity. But there are others, perhaps smaller in scale, and still equally painful to enumerate. There are roughly 1,500 Jews in Iraq who are hostages of their own government. The same is true in Syria where there are 4,500 Jews living in the sleepless haunt of senseless and inhumane retribution, punishment for the crime of existing. According to some accounts, all the Jews of Damascus are confined to a zone beyond which they dare not venture. If they do, it is because of a major exception such as an illness requiring hospitalization. Jews are barred from public office and the professions, forced into degrading positions for no reason at all.

These are stories of religious prosecution. In the next chapter of the book of man you will find political prosecution: Eastern Europe, the Ukraine, China, West Pakistanis, and Baharis in Bangladesh, to name but a few.

Is it not, then, the obligation of the United States to do what it can to help take us out of this chapter and on to the next, one where world law and government prevail? We are still a rich Nation, at least rich enough to afford to help Soviet Jews resettle in Israel. The cost for Israel is $30,000 per family and predictions for the influx of Jewish emigres from the Soviet Union during 1972 are in the range of 40,000 to 50,000 people. For a country the size of Israel with a GNP in the range of $5 billion, and a foreign debt of over $3 billion, the cost is phenomenal. For the United States the cost is minimal, especially when expressed in human terms.

I prefer not to name a price when the subject is human lives and welfare. Israel has not asked the United States for help, anymore than the United States asked other countries for help when it felt the sudden growing pains of an influx of immigrants. But the United States was big and could easily absorb a burst in population. Israel cannot. Israel's wealth lies in her dedication to human freedom.

The United States has always considered itself a Nation of immigrants, and Israel wears the same robe. Now we must share it so she can continue to be the great haven from prosecution she has become.

SENATOR HAYDEN

Mr. JORDAN of Idaho. Mr. President, the rich and fulfilled life of the Honorable Carl Hayden has come to a close and it is with great sorrow and deep respect that I pay tribute to our esteemed colleague today.

The facts have all been given—little remains to be said about this "Arizona legend"—for Carl Hayden's record is a monument in itself, it needs no oral commentary.

The words of the English jurist and antiquary, John Selden—"They that govern the most make the least noise"—could well have been spoken in reference to the late Senator from Arizona. Indeed, Carl's silence wielded more power than most men's speech.

Men the caliber of Carl Hayden do not walk through the Chamber doors everyday—his departure from the Senate 4 years ago created a gap and his recent departure from this good earth creates an even greater gap. We shall all miss Carl Trumbull Hayden.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF POSITION ON VOTE

Mr. MILLER. Mr. President, on February 3, while I was necessarily absent, the Senate voted (No. 32 Leg.) on an amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia (Mr. BYRD), to reduce the U.S. contribution to the Inter-American Development Bank. If I had been present, I would have voted "nay." I ask that the permanent Record reflect my position.

PRESIDENT'S INTERFERENCE WITH THE LEGAL SERVICES PROGRAM

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, about once a year since the inception of the Federal legal services program, men of conscience have had to stand up to defend that program against short-sighted, narrow-minded, politically motivated agents of injustice. Whether it was the various so-called Murphy amendments, or the Reagan veto or other less notorious conflicts such as regionalization, by and large, the forces of justice triumphed each time in form if not in substance. Unfortunately, the time has come once again for men of good will to stand up in the name of justice, and this time the threat is open and blatant and comes from the man who stands a heartbeat away from the Presidency.

The newspaper stories of the past 2 days describing the Vice President's efforts to interfere with the proper functioning of both the OEO Office of Legal Services and the judicial system in the State of New Jersey, as well as the lawyer-client relationships between poor Americans and their attorneys, cannot be attributed to an isolated happenstance. Rather it is clear that he has embarked upon a concerted and deliberate effort, with malice aforethought, to tear down the structure that the Congress and the bar and the directors of legal services and, at least until 1969, the White House and the poor people themselves have built to give full meaning to the concept of equal justice under law. It is not by happenstance that the Vice President made a trip to Camden, N.J., last month to begin his campaign with a rash and irrational public attack on the local legal services program.

It is not by happenstance that the Vice President held his now famous meeting this week with OEO and Camden legal services officials after he had been specifically warned by executive branch attorneys that his continued public interference in the Camden litigation could well bring severe professional criticism that his statements were ethically improper and highly prejudicial, and would obstruct and delay the possibility of successful settlement negotiations.

It is not happenstance that at the Vice President's request the highly professional Bureau of Budget staff was asked to play the heavies and lean on the legal services office to cut off the Camden program, after the Vice President had received an unequivocal legal opinion that there was no basis whatsoever for such a cutoff and that the Camden program had been operated competently and fully within the applicable laws and regulations. And it is hard to believe that it is happenstance that delivered a transcript of his Tuesday meeting, prepared by the Vice President's office, to the New York Times on Wednesday, although it was unavailable to Members of Congress on Thursday.

Mr. President, I cannot fathom the Vice President's logic in arraying himself against the legal services concept—perhaps he feels the need to strengthen his own position on the ticket by pondering to the Reagan Republicans, or perhaps he thinks he is protecting the President's right flank during the Peking trip by this attack on the rights of the poor—but his rationale is unimportant. The simple fact is that after he has been told by his own party's executive appointees that the city of Camden has been in willful noncompliance with applicable State and Federal statutes and regulations affecting poor people's rights and racial discrimination and that suits against local government are necessary to vindicate the rights of the poor, the Vice President wants to ignore both the rights and the remedies to which the poor, like all citizens, are entitled.

I am left with only one question for the Vice President: Where, Mr. Vice President, would you rather see America's poor resolving their legitimate complaints—in the courts, or in the streets?

Mr. President, I think the RECORD should show the advice the Vice President received before his meeting this week, and I ask that the conclusions of the memorandum presented to him be printed.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF CONCLUSIONS IN MEMORANDUM TO VICE PRESIDENT ON CAMDEN REGIONAL LEGAL SERVICES (CRLS)

Based on the information received and examined to date, several conclusions can be reached:

(1) There have been no instances of substantial noncompliance by CRLS with applicable statutory and regulatory requirements governing the operation of a Legal Services project.

(2) There is no credible evidence available to enable the federal government to prosecute successful termination proceedings against CRLS.

(3) Without reference to any specific case now in litigation, there is evidence that for several years there has been a pattern of willful non-compliance by the City of Camden with applicable state and federal statutes and regulations governing the relocation of displaced residents, effective community involvement in efforts to deal with urban decay, and the prevention of racial discrimination.

(4) Public comments by public officials concerning pending litigation subject the officials to the possibility of severe professional criticism that they are ethically improper and highly prejudicial when they purport to favor one party or attack the other.

(5) Continued reliance by governmental litigants on the prospect of pressures being brought by federal officials and funding agencies against the opposing litigants obstructs and delays the possibility of successful settlement negotiations.

(6) Camden Regional Legal Services in general, and attorneys David Dugan and Peter O'Connor in particular, are professionally competent, ethical lawyers deeply committed to obtaining equal justice for the poor.

(7) The Camden Coalition and other individual litigants represented by CRLS perceive grievances and seek judicial relief; and CRLS represents them in negotiation and litigation in the same manner as competent private counsel would represent paying clients—in both situations the clients retain ultimate control within the bounds of the law, of the decisions to be made concerning terms of settlement or insistence on continuing litigation.

(8) Community complaints about city inaction and failure to comply with the law pre-dated the existence of CRLS and led to the prior formation of the Camden Coalition.

(9) Effective legal representation of the poor in following the Congressional mandate to provide equal justice and attack the paradox of poverty requires a heavy emphasis on broad impact litigation to reform the law.

(10) In order to effectively vindicate the rights of the poor, it may be necessary to litigate cases against units of government at any level, for history is replete with instances of official abuse and denial of fundamental rights of individuals—with such litigation always constitutionally subject to ultimate review by an independent judiciary in our adversary system of justice.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as a member of the Employment, Manpower, and Poverty Subcommittee and as chairman of the Administrative Practices Subcommittee, I have also asked Mr. Speaker's office and the Vice President's office to provide full information on these events, and I am awaiting that information now. I am hopeful that the Senate will give this matter its full attention.

SENATOR ROBERTSON

Mr. JORDAN of Idaho. Mr. President, it is with sadness that I join my colleagues in mourning the passing of another great American patriot, the late Senator A. Willis Robertson.

In the few years we served together, I developed a great respect for this fine Virginian, who served his State and country in a manner deserving of the highest of tributes and the greatest of praise.

The late Senator and I shared many mutual interests—among them finance, economics, and conservation—not to mention a great love and respect for the outdoors. Senator Robertson was a most versatile scholar and I can remember conversing with him on subjects ranging from the shenanigans of college football to the intricacies of international finance. Even though we wore different party labels, I often sought his counsel during my early days in this body. I had great respect for his nonpartisan judgment and openminded attitude for I knew that behind each word he spoke lurked a great amount of thought and wisdom.

Senator Robertson was a most effective and able statesman and none would deny that his 20 years of service in this Chamber were wellspent. Indeed, Virginia and the Nation have lost one of their finest public servants—and I have lost a dear friend.

SOCIAL SECURITY FINANCING—SOME ACTION NECESSARY

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, a recent article in the monthly review of the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond examined the entire question of social security financing: How to change it; what assumptions currently underlie the present system; and what new assumptions are necessary if this system is to be made more equitable and efficient.

The article clearly shows what all of us in Congress already know: that though the social security system has served this country well over the years, the financing of social security has now reached the point where we must make significant changes in the fundamental assumptions that underpin the current system. The present system places an inordinate burden on wage earners of this Nation, and especially on low-income wage earners. It has created an intolerable situation, a situation which requires swift and comprehensive reform. As this Richmond article states:

The adoption of a predetermined system to establish tax and benefit schedules has definite advantages. In the past, Social Security beneficiaries have had to rely on ad hoc decisions by Congress to receive increased benefits. Adoption of the recommendations by the advisory council would result in automatic adjustments of benefit payments following increases in prices. Revising the method of forecasting benefit payments and taxes to reflect more accurately anticipated economic conditions and maintaining trust fund balances equal to one year's benefits would allow payment of benefits to increase without comparable tax increases in the near future. This change, however, would not reduce the overall cost of payments. The new financing system might reduce the volume of Social Security tax receipts temporarily, but it would also necessitate a larger volume of tax receipts in the next century. An increase in benefits would have to be financed, sooner or later, from an increase in taxes.

Last November I introduced legislation which would have instituted a system of general revenue financing, raised the minimum monthly social security benefit to $100, and provided for a 10 percent across-the-board increase in other monthly benefits. As I pointed out when I introduced S. 2838:

Social Security has been the psychological and financial breakwater against individual and family catastrophe. Millions of recipients have found their lives made more secure by it. . . . Without a doubt, the economic status of the aged is bleak. These persons have worked a lifetime—they have contributed to society, they are responsible citizens; they are deserving citizens. . . . We simply must make provisions for our retired persons that adequately support them without draining the resources of current workers.

We were late in establishing a system of social security for the aged; several other countries adopted their systems before we did. In many ways we are still behind. The welfare of our aged, as well as the burden placed on our taxpayers, is approaching crisis proportions. For the sake of all Americans, we must begin to consider proposals for change.

I ask unanimous consent that "Social Security Financing: A New Package or Just New Packaging," by James R. McCabe, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOCIAL SECURITY FINANCING: A NEW PACKAGE OR JUST NEW PACKAGING?

INTRODUCTION

The social welfare activities of Government have grown significantly since the passage of the Social Security Act in 1935. Congress has progressively expanded the original social security program to include disability insurance, hospital insurance, and supplementary medical insurance, as well as old-age and survivors insurance.

The expansion in programs has been accompanied by expansion in coverage of workers. The proportion of persons in paid employment covered by social security increased from 58 percent in 1940 to 90 percent in 1971. By 1950, the Social Security Act has been amended to cover railroad workers, certain World War II veterans, regularly employed farm and domestic workers, nonfarm self-employed persons, and Federal civilian employees not under the Federal retirement system. Legislation in the 1950's and 1960's brought professional, self-employed individuals, members of the Armed Forces, and ministers into the programs.

Social security tax receipts also have grown over the past 35 years because of growth in covered population, higher tax rates, and higher maximum wage bases—the maximum annual wages to which social security tax rates are applied (Table I). Social security taxes paid in fiscal 1971 totaled $52.7 billion, compared to the $593 million paid in 1940. In 1937, covered employees and their employers each were taxed at a rate of 1 percent of the employee's annual wages up to $3,000. By 1971, the tax rate on individual employee wages paid by both the employee and employer had increased to 5.2 percent, and the wage base had risen to $7,800. The 1972 tax rate is 5.2 percent, with a maximum wage base of $9,000. Under present law (PL 92-5), the base is not scheduled to increase after 1972, but the tax rate will rise to 6.05 percent by 1987.

Whether these future tax schedules will become effective is problematical. In accordance with the provisions of the Social Security Act, in 1969, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare appointed an Advisory Council, composed of 13 members representing different public interests, to review the status of the social security trust funds in terms of long-term commitments, adequacy and scope of benefit coverage, and impact on public assistance.¹ The Council's recommendations, submitted in March 1971, call for provisions to increase benefits and the maximum tax base automatically and to formalize the present pay-as-you-go financing system. Limitation of trust fund balances at a level approximately equal to one year's benefit payments and revision of current conservative estimates of future tax receipts could result in larger benefit payments without comparable tax increases in the near future. Other recommendations, however, include larger benefit payments not currently scheduled.

Footnotes at end of article.

If Congress were to adopt the financing and benefit payment reform recommended by the Advisory Council, increases in tax rates after 1972 might be postponed until after the year 2000. Under this proposal, the tax rate paid by both employees and employers would increase to 6 percent in 1972, and the maximum wage base would rise to $12,000 in 1974. Further increases would automatically follow gains in employee earnings (Table II). Even so, under this proposal, total social security taxes paid would increase. The Council's recommendations are discussed in a later section of this article.

² Tax rates would be increased if benefits are increased to reflect adjustments for standard of living.

THE CURRENT PROGRAM

Financing

Employers withhold social security taxes from their employees and remit the proceeds, along with their own matching contributions and withheld income taxes, to the Treasury. Social security taxes are then transferred from the Treasury's general revenue fund to the social security trust funds according to the tax rates on wages of covered employees shown in Table I. Those who are eligible and elect to participate in the supplementary medical insurance program pay monthly premiums that are matched by Government contributions from the general revenue fund. Additional trust fund receipts from the general revenue fund finance certain benefit payments and cover interest on U.S. Treasury securities held by each trust fund.

Trust funds

Reflecting the concept that social security benefits are related to contributions, the tax receipts are placed in designated trust funds that are separate from the general revenue fund. The current method of financing and the present size of trust fund balances, however, reflect a current-cost financing system or a pay-as-you-go approach. Current balances in the OASI and DI trust funds would support benefit payments at their present level for only 13 months. This current-cost system certainly would not meet the actuarial standards of private insurance companies. To be considered actuarially sound, a private insurance fund should be sufficient to pay all accrued liabilities if operations were terminated. Social security actuaries and most policymakers, however, have an alternate conception of soundness for social security insurance. That is, expected future receipts should be sufficient to cover anticipated benefit payments and administrative costs over a specific valuation period. Under this theory, the benefits to be paid to current contributors depend upon the taxes to be paid by future contributors.

Cycle of financing and benefit payments

Congress has followed no official schedule or guidelines in increasing social security taxes and benefits over the years. In recent years, however, pressure to raise benefits has arisen because of sharp increases in prices and loss of purchasing power of benefits. In addition, a noticeable pattern has resulted, in part, from the method of forecasting future taxes and benefit payments used by the Social Security Administration.¹ Even though more accurate short- and intermediate-range estimates of future tax receipts are prepared, conservative, long-range forecasts have dominated Congressional decisions regarding increases in benefit payments. Benefit and tax schedules are determined so that the social security programs are actuarially sound according to social security insurance standards—long-run benefit payments equal long-run receipts. The long-range forecasts, though, have historically underestimated future tax receipts because they have underestimated future earnings. As a result, cash surpluses have been higher than estimated, and trust fund balances have increased to such an extent that the program has appeared to be overfinanced according to social security actuarial standards.

As a result, strong pressure to increase benefits has developed every year or so, and on several occasions Congress has amended the Social Security Act to liberalize benefits. When this has been done, however, Congress has usually set new tax schedules to provide for relatively small increases in the funds.

Footnotes at end of article.

Underlying assumptions

Projections of future social security tax receipts and benefit payments are largely dependent upon future taxable earnings and population growth and composition. Estimates for the various time periods shown in Table III are based on alternate assumptions. Short-range estimates for old-age survivors insurance and disability insurance are based on the assumption that tax and benefit schedules will not change from those under existing law. Intermediate-range estimates for both programs assume periodic increases in the maximum taxable earnings base. Because growth in both earnings and benefits is assumed in the short- and intermediate-range forecasts, these projections are more realistic than long-range estimates.

Hospital insurance (HI) estimates are based on assumptions that include growth in taxable earnings and rising costs of benefits because of a larger number of beneficiaries and higher hospitalization costs. The maximum wage base is expected to increase at the same rate as wages covered by social security.

Evaluation of the actuarial soundness of the supplementary medical insurance (SMI) program is made by comparing short-range estimates of benefit payments to estimates of tax receipts based upon the current contribution premium. If the contributions are projected to fall short of benefit payments, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare may increase the monthly premium each December.

To insure ample trust fund balances, conservative, long-range projections, which underestimate future tax receipts, assume that average earnings and prices will remain unchanged from those prevailing at the time of the forecast. Policy decisions by Congress are usually based on intermediate-cost estimates of long-range forecasts that are simply averages of high-cost and low-cost estimates. Different projections of population growth result in a range of cost estimates rather than a single projection. Comparison of intermediate-range projections with long-range projections of trust fund balances for 1980, 1985, and 1990 shows that forecasts that assume no change in wages and prices consistently underestimate future trust fund balances. Therefore, if long-range forecasts were based on more realistic assumptions, Congress could increase the amount of current benefits and, at the same time, continue to provide for an actuarially sound program.

ADVISORY COUNCIL RECOMMENDATIONS

Selected changes in social security financing recommended in March 1971 by the Advisory Council on Social Security are summarized below:

1. Cost estimates for cash benefits should be based—as the estimates for the hospital insurance program now are—on the assumptions that earnings levels will rise, that the contribution and benefit base will be increased as earnings levels rise, and that benefits will be increased as prices rise.

2. Tax rates should be based on single, best estimates derived from a single set of assumptions that reflect likely future trends in factors that affect income and outgo of the program.

3. Current-cost financing should be adopted to include maintenance of trust fund levels equal to one year's expenditures.

4. Explicit procedures to determine benefit and tax schedules should be established. Increases in benefits should be automatic and based on increases in prices. The maximum wage base should increase to $9,000 in 1972 and to $12,000 in 1974. Thereafter, the maximum wage base should increase automatically at the same rate earnings increase. Tax rates increases would be established by Congress on an ad hoc basis at the time real improvement in benefit payments is granted.

5. General revenue financing of the combined Medicare program should eventually equal one-third of total program costs.⁶

EVALUATIONS OF RECOMMENDATIONS

The first three recommendations reflect the Council's desire for Congress formally to adopt and improve the present method of pay-as-you-go financing. More realistic estimates of future cash flows and trust fund balances would eliminate the conservative bias that usually results in overfinancing. Coordination of the new estimates with the plan to limit trust fund balances would mean that social security taxes, in this century, could be less than presently scheduled.

The Council's fourth recommendation is designed to eliminate the present financing cycle by establishing an explicit schedule to increase social security taxes and benefits. To supplement the automatic increases designed to maintain purchasing power of beneficiaries, Congress could finance ad hoc changes in real benefits—benefit increases greater than changes in price levels—by increasing social security tax rates.

Revision of Medicare financing, recommendation five, is necessary because the health insurance trust fund will be exhausted in 1973. Also, the Council believes that the current method of financing supplementary medical insurance from monthly premiums paid by current beneficiaries results in an excessive burden on contributors. Because supplementary medical insurance benefit payments are not based on prior earnings or contributions, increased financing from the general revenue fund is advocated. Benefits would be financed by equal contributions from employee, employer, and general revenue.

Comparative costs

The Advisory Council's proposal to stabilize social security tax rates at 6 percent would seem very appealing when compared to the alternative of rising tax rates scheduled under current law (Table II). The Council's recommendations, however, call for greater contributions by increasing the maximum wage base at the same rate as the earnings of workers covered by social security. Furthermore, the Council's recommendations include greater benefits than currently legislated. Yet, even though these larger benefits are not scheduled under current law, if the current financing system were maintained, benefits would be increased over time as overfinancing again resulted in surpluses.

Overemphasis of the declining tax rate for old-age, survivors, and disability insurance until after the year 2000 could lead to misunderstanding of the true cost of the recommended program. These declining tax rates would be offset by an increase in tax rates for Medicare, i.e., hospital and supplementary medical insurance.

The Office of the Actuary of the Social Security Administration has estimated that the cost of benefits recommended by the Council would average 15.82 percent of taxable payroll over the valuation period ending in the year 2045.⁴ By comparison, the cost of benefits provided by present law would average 13.41 percent of taxable payroll. In addition, increased general revenue financing under the proposed program is estimated to total 1.3 percent of taxable payroll in 1975.

Stabilization of tax rates under the Council's program is predicated on the benefit schedule of the proposed system. After 1975, benefit payments under the Council's plan would rise more slowly than they have in the past because automatic increases in benefits would be tied to price increases. However, Congress could still decide to increase real benefits and finance the increase by hikes in the tax rate. Therefore, the Advisory Council's 6 percent tax rate figure might well be considered only a minimum. Furthermore, the Council estimated wages—the source of taxes—to grow at twice the rate of increase of prices. A slower productivity growth would reduce this relationship and increase pressure to raise tax rates to finance scheduled benefits. Also, in the past, a large part of the increased financing resulted from expanded coverage of workers. Expansion of coverage in the future, however, will be limited because 90 percent of workers in paid employment are already covered by social security. Thus, it seems likely that in the future most unanticipated financing needs will have to be met by increasing tax rates or the maximum wage base.

Expected changes in the composition of the population after the year 2000 will affect both the proposed and current program. The ratio of beneficiaries, mainly those who are 65 years of age or older, to taxed wage earners, those who are 20 to 64 years of age, is expected to increase significantly. If the current-cost financing proposed by the Council is adopted, tax rates would have to increase sharply near the year 2011. Alternatively, if trust fund balances were allowed to increase as currently forecasted, these funds could be drawn down to supplement tax receipts in the next century.

PENDING LEGISLATION

In June 1971, less than three months after the Advisory Council presented its report to Congress, the House passed bill HR 1, which included certain reforms recommended by the Council.⁵ At the time of this writing, the Senate has not yet acted on this legislation. Under this bill, liberalization of certain benefits would become effective in January 1972, in addition to an increase in benefits of 5 percent beginning in June 1972. The maximum wage base would increase to $10,200 in 1972 and to $10,800 in 1974; tax rates would increase to 5.4 percent in 1972, 6.2 percent in 1974, and 7.4 percent in 1977.

To maintain the purchasing power of the benefits, the bill provides for automatic increases if prices rose by at least 3 percent during the preceding year and if no increase in benefits had been granted during the preceding year on an ad hoc basis. The increase in benefits, to compensate for a rising cost of living, would be financed by an increase in the maximum wage base in proportion to the increase in the level of average covered wages.

The long-range estimates of taxes and benefits used to determine the actuarial soundness of the provisions in bill HR 1 were based on the assumption of constant prices and constant average earnings. As in the past, the long-range estimates to determine benefit and tax schedules were based on intermediate-cost assumptions. No single, best estimate, as recommended by the Council, was used. The House voted not to increase contributions from the general fund to finance social security programs, except to cover benefits extended to certain disabled beneficiaries.

In part, the automatic adjustments in benefit payments and maximum wage bases would incorporate the current-cost or pay-as-you-go financing system into the social security program. Short-range estimates of future balances of old-age, survivors, and disability insurance trust funds under bill HR 1 are closer approximations of yearly expenditures. Even so, under bill HR 1, long-range estimates of future trust fund balances are significantly higher than those estimated under current law. Under bill HR 1, it is estimated that the old-age and survivors trust fund would total $410.7 billion by the year 2025, compared to $272.7 billion under current law. Therefore, the pay-as-you-go financing system has not been completely adopted.

CONCLUSION

The adoption of a predetermined system to establish tax and benefit schedules has definite advantages. In the past, social security beneficiaries have had to rely on ad hoc decisions by Congress to receive increased benefits. Adoption of the recommendations by the Advisory Council would result in automatic adjustments of benefit payments following increases in prices.

Revising the method of forecasting benefit payments and taxes to reflect more accurately anticipated economic conditions and maintaining trust fund balances equal to one year's benefits would allow payment of benefits to increase without comparable tax increases in the near future. This change, however, would not reduce the overall cost of payments.

The new financing system might reduce the volume of social security tax receipts temporarily, but it would also necessitate a larger volume of tax receipts in the next century. An increase in benefits would have to be financed, sooner or later, from an increase in taxes.

SPECIAL EDUCATION INNOVATIONS

Mr. DOLE, Mr. President, an innovation in handicapped education has been undertaken by a Kansas special education project headquartered in Dodge City.

The new system accommodates hard-of-hearing, visually impaired, and mentally retarded children of various age groups in special education classrooms. Each classroom is specially equipped to handle a specific disability. Eventually satellite centers will be set up in order to facilitate participation by eligible children who reside great distances from Dodge City.

I ask unanimous consent that an informative article from the January 29 Hutchinson, Kans., News, regarding this new technique in special education, be printed in the RECORD to obtain wide distribution and to call attention to the beneficial ideas introduced by this program. The information may be helpful to other school systems seeking ways to improve their special education programs.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DODGE CITY SPECIAL ED PROJECT: PLAN "SATELLITE" SCHOOLS

(By Mary Anne Crabb)

DODGE CITY.—Five more schools were accepted for membership this week in the Southwest Kansas Area Special Education Project headquartered in Dodge City.

They are Ness City, Dighton, Ransom, Bazine and Utica. They will participate in the comprehensive special education program set up last year by Dodge City and seven neighborhood school districts—Bucklin, Cimarron-Ensign, Ingalls, Jetmore, Minneola, Montezuma and Spearville-Windthorst.

Services now are centered in Dodge, but, with the addition of the new schools, satellite centers will be started, said Harold Hosey, assistant superintendent of schools at Dodge and director of SKASEP. The new schools will be surveyed as to needs, a staff will be hired and the program will be ready to go next fall.

NEED TWO MORE

At least two additional teachers, for the educable mentally retarded (EMR) and speech therapy programs probably will be needed.

Employment of three additional teachers was approved Wednesday for improvement of the current program by the board of directors. They are for the EMR program, speech therapy and a school psychologist.

The program will be financed 62 per cent by Dodge City and 38 per cent by the remaining schools, at $4,000 each.

About 500 children are receiving some type of special training this year, Hosey said. Dodge City has an enrollment of approximately 4,500 and the present seven other schools have a combined enrollment of 3,600.

WORK IN HOUSE

One of the unusual aspects of the SKASEP program is the training provided for the older group of trainable mentally retarded. Eleven students, ages 12 to 19, spend the school day in a six-room house where they clean, cook, wash, iron and work in a basement workshop, as well as attend classes in speech therapy, math, arts and crafts and reading. Each student buys food at the nearby supermarket.

The students are repairing pop cases in the workshop and are making a small profit on the work.

The house idea was borrowed from Omaha, Neb., Hosey said, and he recommends it for any special education program.

USE RANCH FACILITIES

Another unique part of the SKASEP program is use of the ranch facilities of Methodist Youthville Inc. near Dodge for emotionally disturbed students. Youngsters from throughout the district can be accommodated at day classes there. Usually the student remains at least a semester, but may attend longer. SKASEP pays the teacher and Youthville provides the facilities.

The cooperative has the only program for hard-of-hearing children in Southwest Kansas, and children from as far away as Liberal are enrolled. The nine now enrolled formerly were being educated in Wichita, and Amarillo, Tex.

APPLY FOR GRANT

An application has been made for a federal grant of $13,000 for electronic equipment necessary to equip another classroom for the hard-of-hearing.

In the past, the project has had a class for the visually impaired, but enrollment was not great enough to require the program this year. The one youngster who is totally blind is enrolled in the second grade and is receiving special tutoring.

The current traveling staff includes two psychologists, responsible for evaluating and placing students in various programs, and four speech clinicians.

Five classrooms with six teachers are provided in Dodge City for educable mentally retarded children, ages six to 18.

The junior high program includes two teachers working with 25 students in team teaching.

Two classrooms have been set up for nine children, age six to 12, in the beginning level for the trainable mentally retarded.

Three teachers work in the area of learning disabilities, a program for students who have difficulty in the regular classroom due to hearing and sight problems. These are the first classrooms for learning disabilities in Southwest Kansas, Hosey said, and are serving approximately 21 students.

One teacher travels to outlying classrooms to train teachers in handling learning disabilities. Another learning disabilities teacher has been employed in the Dodge City school system through Title I of the federal education act.

NEW SERVICE

A new service initiated this year, with total federal funding, is an instructional materials center for special education programs, serving 28 counties.

Dodge City is one of seven satellite depositories from the main center at the University of Kansas. The Dodge center, staffed by three persons, contains equipment and materials used primarily for work with handicapped children. It has access to all materials housed at KU.

The Southwest Kansas program is a way for schools to comply with the September 1974 deadline set by the legislature for establishment of services for students with handicaps specified as educable mental retardation, trainable mental retardation, cerebral palsy and epilepsy, for which schools will receive state reimbursement. Other special education services, with state reimbursement, probably will be required later, Hosey said.

DOCK STRIKE HEARING RESUMED

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, yesterday the Labor and Public Welfare Committee resumed its hearings on Senate Joint Resolution 187, which Senator JAVITS and I have cosponsored in an effort to end the west coast dock tieup, now in its 17th week.

Testimony on the impact of this critical situation was presented by Transportation Secretary Volpe, Agriculture Secretary Butz, and Commerce Undersecretary Lynn. The statements brought to the committee by these distinguished gentlemen were tremendously informative, and I believe clarified for all who listened to the disastrous nature of the continuing dock blockage. I ask unanimous consent to have these excellent statements printed and further commend them to all Senators for their reading.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SECRETARY JOHN A. VOLPE, BEFORE THE SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON LABOR OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE, ON SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 187, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1972

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you today in support of S.J. Resolution 187. I only wish, however, that my appearances before this Committee concerning a crippling strike in the transportation industry would be less frequent. My real regret, however, is that the Congress has had before it, for almost two years, a proposal which would provide a meaningful remedy for settling these disputes without congressional action.

In February 1970, the President first submitted to Congress his Emergency Public Interest Protection Act designed to amend our hopelessly antiquated transportation labor relations legislation and bring to an end the devastating effects of strikes and lockouts in the transportation industry. The President again recommended that proposal (S. 560) to this Congress on February 3, 1971, and just two weeks ago, in his State of the Union message, repeated his urgent call for action. In submitting S.J. Resolution 187 to Congress, the President made it clear that we were again at the "flash point" because of Congress' inaction on his comprehensive labor legislation, which he has aptly renamed the "Crippling Strikes Prevention Act." As you know, Mr. Chairman, again yesterday the President issued another plea to the Congress for immediate action on both S.J. Resolution 187 and S. 560.

The last time I came before this Committee, I left hopeful that a permanent resolution of this problem was near at hand and that Congress was ready to act.

I am sorry to say I was disappointed. But I remain optimistic. It is through the Congress—through your efforts—that we shall solve this problem. I sincerely hope that this labor impasse is the last we shall have to solve by short term action.

The proposal we are considering today (S. J. Res. 187) is not a comprehensive solution for ending disputes in the transportation industry. It is yet another emergency measure meant to solve fully only the crisis at hand. Yet it must be passed—limited as it is—to protect the interest of the American people until a permanent solution is legislated for all transportation strikes.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, rare is the occasion that I come before the Congress and use harsh words. Unfortunately, this occasion demands harsh words.

I find my appearance today discouraging for another reason. As I believe most of you know, I have had a long association with labor unions and still hold a lifetime membership in the International Plasterers Union. I believe in the trade union movement. I know what it has meant to the American working man. Yet, I also know that the participants in the West Coast dock strike cannot be allowed to show a callous disregard for the American people. Frankly, the history of the current West Coast strike is a sorry one. Negotiations have continued on and off for 15 months. Both sides—management and labor—have been to blame for a seeming inability to resolve their differences.

Let me just say something which I know this Commission is certainly well aware of, but which I think bears repeating. Strikes and lockouts are economic tools of labor and management. They are meant to assert pressure, to change values and constraints, to make settlement preferable to the continuation of the status quo. This dock strike, however, is similar to many transportation strikes in that its economic effects fall heavily on the shoulders of people not directly involved. People truly affected are the farmers whose crops lie rotting while the entire Pacific marketplace is closed to them. Other people truly affected are the Hawaiian housewives who pay exorbitant prices for everyday goods which must be airlifted from the mainland. And we should not forget the thousands of union members—in all trades and industries—who are also affected.

What of the factory workers who must be laid off because their factory can neither receive its raw materials nor deliver its finished products? What of solidarity now?

And what of our country's economic health? We are now deeply involved in, and individually committed to, phase two of the President's new economic policy. All of us—not just management—not just labor—not just the housewife—but all Americans must strive to break the cruel inflationary spiral which saps our prosperity and standard of living. We are now, after a revaluation of our country's currency, for the first time in a great while able to compete successfully in European and Asian markets. How can we allow the approximately 13,000 participants in this dispute to frustrate the economic expectations of more than 200 million Americans? There is too much at stake to allow so few to harm so many.

If you think these are harsh words, just look at our projections, based on an analysis of last September's dock strike.

The losses in port service industries which are directly involved in the dispute are estimated to be about 8 million dollars a week. The loss to the shipping industry is estimated at 3 million dollars a week, and the loss to the inland transportation companies, 5 million dollars per week. Greater losses will appear in the wholesale and retail trade sectors—29 million dollars per week—and in the industrial and agricultural sectors of the economy—46 million dollars per week. These losses will add up to a 3.4 percent reduction in the regional product of the West Coast States measured at a weekly rate at the height of impact.

Since this Nation's transportation system is so complex and interrelated, the elimination of one of the modes has an immediate effect on the connecting modes. In this case, the initiation of the West Coast dock strike resulted in the embargoing of all rail and truck traffic destined for the West Coast ports.

Depending upon the inventories and amount of storage facility available, the losses caused by the strike would begin within days after the strike and would build to a peak in about 8 weeks. Due to the previous work stoppage, inventories are probably in a more serious condition now than at the beginning of the conflict in July.

The peak employment impact, not including agriculture, would be as follows:

Shipping, 5 thousand people out of work.
Port services, 18 thousand people out of work.

Inland transportation, 10 thousand people out of work.

Trade, 7 thousand people out of work.
Industry, 148 thousand people out of work.

Each day this strike is permitted to continue, the more burdensome the results will become and the more difficult a full recovery will prove to be. At this point in time we can only speculate on markets permanently lost, income losses from spoiled produce and non-recoverable losses to surface transportation modes due to diverted or cancelled traffic. Be assured, however, that as the data come in and the impact is fully documented, it will make grim reading for all concerned—workers—industry—and government.

The proposal the Administration brings before you today was outlined and explained earlier by Secretary Hodgson. I shall not repeat his statement. Let me only say this: compulsory arbitration should be the last choice in any free economic society—a choice rightfully exercised only in extreme situations. But, Mr. Chairman, we have reached such a situation. We are at the point where there is left only that last choice.

The President and the Administration have reluctantly but responsibly reached that difficult decision. It is now time for Congress to exercise similar responsibility.

In the future—and I hope the very near future—you shall see fit to enact a more comprehensive measure. Now, however, you must move forward immediately to meet the crisis at hand. I am confident that the Congress will act in the public interest.

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE EARL L. BUTZ, SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE, BEFORE THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE FEBRUARY 3, 1972

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: I am grateful for your invitation to meet with the Committee and to discuss the need for emergency strike legislation. American farmers are being hurt each day by a strike that eliminates a major part of their overseas market. They are seriously concerned, and I am concerned on their behalf.

The farmer is much more dependent on exports than the operators of most other businesses. He ships overseas the production from almost one cropland acre out of four—even more in the case of such major crops as wheat and soybeans. Our agriculture must compete effectively in world trade, or it simply cannot exist on anything like the scale that we know it today.

U.S. farmers were seriously injured by last year's strikes—on the West Coast, at the Port of Chicago, and at Atlantic and Gulf ports. But they did have the benefit of injunctions that opened the ports and kept them open through a critical period during and following the harvest—a record harvest, by the way, for major crops.

The frightening thing to farmers, as we look ahead in 1972, is that they cannot look for further help from their government under existing legislation. The West Coast ports have again closed, and the injunction on the East Coast and Gulf ports is rapidly coming to an end. Farmers fear that their outlets to world markets will be totally closed.

To put this into dollar figures, the West Coast strike is reducing farm exports by almost $6 million every work day that it remains in effect. If East and Gulf ports again go on strike, this will reduce farm exports by $18 million a day. Moreover, there is good evidence that these strikes are damaging our reputation as a dependable supplier of farm products, and this loss could be immeasurable.

It is so important to realize that these strikes not only halt shipping and clog the ports, they also disrupt the entire system by backing up commodities into barges, rail cars, trucks, and warehouses all the way to the farm.

Farmers, along with other major users of the transportation system, have long been concerned by the danger in protracted and crippling strikes. Almost two years ago, President Nixon requested legislation that would give him certain options in the case of strikes such as those now occurring. That legislation was reintroduced last year.

Now, with a specific strike causing untold losses and hardship to farmers and others who are not a party to the issues being negotiated, the President simply is asking for authority to take reasonable action. This is the proposal embodied in S.J.R. 187.

WEST COAST

The short run impact of the dock strikes last summer and fall on agricultural exports is now apparent. The 100-day West Coast dock strike which began July 1, 1971 and was interrupted October 9 by a Taft-Hartley injunction reduced agricultural exports from the West Coast during the June-September period from $288 million a year earlier to $73 million in 1971.

Moreover, this coincided with the harvest of one of the largest wheat crops in the history of the Pacific Northwest. At the peak of harvest over 30 million bushels of wheat were on the ground due to a lack of transportation caused by the dock tieup. Some of this wheat suffered quality deterioration.

The 100-day strike and the threat of a continuation have created uncertainty in the wheat market. Based on purchases by the Japanese Food Agency, the U.S. farmer's share of this market for the March-December period fell from 55 percent to 40 percent. U.S. losses of sales are in the neighborhood of 25 million bushels valued at $40 million, and this loss continues to build. On January 19, the day after the West Coast dock strike resumed, the Japanese purchased 8.7 million bushels of wheat for March-April delivery; yet only 1.6 million bushels were purchased from the United States.

If the strike continues for another 60 days, we will lose wheat sales in Japan and other Asian countries for the rest of this fiscal year. This will result in the buildup of huge wheat stocks in the Pacific Northwest which will compete with next year's crop.

Other Far Eastern countries are looking to other sources of supply. A Korean tender for 110,000 tons of barley off the West Coast was recently cancelled due to the strike, and this barley has been purchased from Australia.

Korean imports of U.S. wheat in July-December 1971 were only 17 million bushels, compared with 28 million bushels in the same months the preceding year. The most affected varieties were hard red winter and soft white. The Koreans have purchased their needs from Australia.

Taiwan's imports of U.S. wheat in July-December 1971 were only 5.0 million bushels, compared with 12.4 million bushels the year before—a decline of almost 60 percent. In western soft wheat alone, the decline in U.S. sales to Taiwan was from 5.4 million bushels in July-December 1970 to only 1.6 million bushels the same months of 1971.

Thus wheat exports were the largest casualty of the 100-day strike, although other commodities were affected too, particularly fruits, vegetables, rice, cotton, and livestock products. Even those commodities that succeeded in reaching foreign markets did not represent a total plus.

Of those commodities which did move about one-half were fruits and vegetables and other non-bulk commodities. Lemons were flown to Japan, and fruits and vegetables were moved overland to Gulf and Canadian ports. Some Oregon seed producers were forced to ship overland to New York City to insure that their contracts would be met with foreign buyers.

The results of these costly diversions were less than encouraging. For example, two shipments of raisins and one shipment of prunes arrived in the United Kingdom contaminated by insects. The shipments have been investigated and the infestation was found to be directly attributable to the required diversionary hauls.

There is normally a constant flow of tallow from renderers to markets. The West Coast dock strike rapidly backed up exports and filled the limited storage available. For a time tallow was diverted to Canadian ports, but now this outlet is no longer available and the tallow is being diverted to the Midwest, at an increased marketing cost of over one cent per pound.

However, for most products the cost involved in diversion was too high, and consequently there were significant losses. In California ten alfalfa meal dehydration plants were forced to close during the West Coast strike. Since exports usually account for about two-thirds of the California output, the domestic market was quickly flooded with alfalfa that would normally be dehydrated for exporting. Furthermore, alfalfa cubes and pellets destined for export and held by the strike were exposed to the sun which reduced carotene content to no more than that of ordinary hay. As a result their value dropped to $30 per ton compared to the pre-strike price of $50 per ton.

The West Coast strike has had a serious impact on prices for acala cotton. This is a specialty cotton grown in the far West which normally sells for a premium of 4 cents per pound above regular cottons. Substantial quantities of acala cotton are exported, and the export market is necessary to maintain the price differential. During the strike and with the threat of a new strike, acala cotton lost its normal premium price and is now selling below the levels of other cottons which do not have acala's unique qualities.

The loss of agricultural exports has a serious impact on port economies. Seattle, a city already beset by serious unemployment problems, is suffering additional losses in employment due to the dock strike. Last year agricultural export losses cost the port district over $1.0 million monthly in wages and $3 million monthly in sales and revenues for local businesses.

CHICAGO

The problems which arose on the West Coast last summer were repeated on the Gulf Coast, the East Coast and in Chicago on the Great Lakes last fall.

The Chicago strike of 9 elevators out of a total 11 in that port began September 1, 1971. These elevators were open from October 9 to November 3 under a temporary restraining order. The court, however, refused to issue an 80-day Taft-Hartley Injunction. The elevators have been closed since that time, and this will again be an acute problem once warm weather reopens the Great Lakes shipping route. Export capacity of the 9 closed elevators was estimated for September-December at 35 million bushels of corn and soybeans. The closing of this vital port during the height of harvest of a record corn and soybean crop was deeply felt in the corn belt. Cash farm prices for corn and soybeans were discounted well below the normal differential between the near term Chicago futures quotation and cash country prices in Indiana and Illinois.

EAST AND GULF COAST

The East and Gulf Coast strikes started October 1, 1971 and ended in late November when Taft-Hartley injunctions were issued. These injunctions expire in the middle of February 1972. An evaluation of the impact of this strike is difficult because some ports were open during part of the October-November period. As an example, the West Gulf Ports which are important outlets for wheat, sorghum, rice, and cotton, continued to work until November 15. New Orleans, the major export point for soybeans and corn was opened from October 28 through November 15 due to an NLRB action. Mobile, Beaumont, and Baltimore were open for shorter periods. Philadelphia was open from October 26 to November 15 under a state court action.

The East and Gulf Coasts normally account for about two-thirds of our total agricultural exports. During the October-November period in 1970 these ports exported $917 million of agricultural products compared to $400 million during the same period in 1971.

The strike impact was especially severe in October on exports of soybeans and corn from Gulf ports. Corn exports were down from $67 million to $9 million and soybeans were down from $95 million to about $16 million. By the time the Taft-Hartley injunction had been issued on the East and Gulf Coasts, 25 ocean-going vessels were idle at Gulf ports, the port elevators were filled, and an estimated 50 million bushels of corn and soybeans were backed up the Mississippi River Valley in barges and railroad cars.

Some of the soybean crushing mills along the Mississippi were forced to close temporarily while others operated at sharply reduced capacity. During this period tallow stocks on the East Coast increased and over 100 million pounds of tobacco were stalled at dockside.

THE COST TO AGRICULTURE

In total, the dock strikes on the East, Gulf and West Coasts reduced U.S. farm exports during the shutdowns by over $700 million from year earlier levels. Diversionsary movements to open ports during the strike, anticipatory shipments off the East and Gulf Coasts before the strike, and heavier than normal shipments following the strike will assist in reducing the losses. However, some losses are permanent, and the impact of these strikes will be felt in lost future sales.

The strike impact is not limited to lost export sales. It is felt in the form of reduced farm prices, increased marketing costs, and spoiled crops. This is especially true for those products for which the export market is substantial. We export over one-half of our rice, wheat, and soybean production; nearly two-fifths of the cattle hides; over one-third of the tallow, tobacco and cotton produced; and one-fifth of total feedgrain sales by U.S. farmers.

For example, if past performance is a guide, we expect that at the height of the strike during October and November, our farmers sold over 800 million bushels of corn and over 500 million bushels of soybeans. The price discounts received by farmers during this period were a direct result of the reduced foreign demand for these commodities caused by the dock strikes.

U.S. agricultural exports this fiscal year could very well be down $400-$500 million below last year. Part of this decline is due to lower unit values for some of our commodities but American agriculture is not getting the volume gains that could come from these lower prices. Without work stoppages Canada is experiencing a record year for barley exports. Some of our key customers are turning to Canada and Australia for more of their wheat supplies. The Russians were forced to purchase part of their corn requirements from Argentina because of the uncertainty of our port situation. Foreign customers are telling American agriculture that they are shifting their purchases elsewhere where they can get assured delivery. That is the real tragedy of these work stoppages—the loss of future sales to our competitors not only for this year but for years to come.

It is of utmost importance that these dock work stoppages be ended promptly, and that provision be made to prevent future tieups in our transportation system. Not to do this, promptly, will be to subject American farmers to an erosion of income which they cannot and should not be expected to endure. They are growing weary of being bloodied, as innocent bystanders, by someone else's fight. They are justifiably incensed and frustrated at not being able to move to market at harvest time the product of a whole year's labor, because of unresolved arguments among small groups of people in transportation. Our farmers want protection from this kind of restrictive action—and they want it now.

STATEMENT OF JAMES T. LYNN, UNDER SECRETARY OF COMMERCE, BEFORE THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE, ON SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 187, FEBRUARY 3, 1972

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: I appreciate the opportunity to appear before your committee to present my views in support of Senate Joint Resolution 187, a resolution to provide procedures for the settlement of the dispute on the Pacific Coast and Hawaii among certain shippers, associated employers and their employees.

In light of Secretary Hodgson's testimony, I will not dwell on the facts of the current longshore dispute. Suffice it to say that the negotiations have been underway since October 1970 and that all attempts to resolve it have failed. The exhaustive mediation efforts by the Director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service and the good offices of the Governors of the Western States have proved to be of no avail. All the procedures for resolving this dispute under the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 have been exhausted.

In September of 1971, the President personally met with the disputing parties in an attempt to settle the impasse. The President's efforts were in vain and he is now asking the Congress for emergency legislation to avert further economic hardship to this Nation.

If the Congress does not act promptly, this strike will cause serious human suffering and economic losses resulting from unemployment, market dislocation, food shortages and higher prices.

Let me spell out these losses in more detail—

BALANCE OF TRADE

Continuation of this strike can only aggravate the U.S. balance of trade position. This could raise serious questions in the minds of our trading partners as to our will and our ability to resolve our economic problems.

As you know, in recent years, U.S. imports have been growing at a faster rate than U.S. exports, progressively diminishing the favorable balance of trade we have long enjoyed. Last year, for the first time since 1893, the United States had a trade deficit. The trade deficit, which was $2 billion, is a matter of highest national concern and vigorous action has been initiated by the Administration and the Congress to reverse the situation.

Many American export commodities have close substitutes in world markets. If our products are not readily available, our foreign customers can obtain and will seek substitutes elsewhere. Moreover, if the strike continues, foreign customers may shift permanently to non-U.S. sources of supply, resulting in a continued loss of export markets.

West Coast ports are important to the conduct of U.S. foreign trade. In 1970, vessel shipments through those ports accounted for $4.2 billion in U.S. exports whereas in 1971, only $3.3 billion in exports were shipped from the West Coast. Although part of this was due to lessened demand by our foreign customers, our figures indicate that the West Coast dock strike has had a significant adverse effect on U.S. shipments to foreign markets. Also, during the 100 day strike which began on July 1, 1971, U.S. exporters were able to divert some shipments to Canadian and Gulf ports at additional expense.

This option has been significantly more limited since the resumption of the strike. Tuesday, pickets at the Mexican Border had to be enjoined from preventing diversions to Mexican ports, and as of yesterday, the Canadian longshoremen were still refusing to load any U.S. products diverted from the West Coast to Canadian ports, although I understand that an injunction was also issued there last night.

Continuation of the present strike would cause our export losses to increase further, particularly since our foreign customers have already been severely inconvenienced and are even less likely to tolerate additional delays in delivery of U.S. products. Exports which depend heavily on West Coast dock facilities for access to international markets would be particularly affected. Among these are exports of logs and lumber, about 75 percent of which normally move through the affected ports, 40 percent of woodpulp exports, and over 33 percent of wheat exports. For example, the Western Wood Products Association estimated that its members suffered actual losses of $943,000 per day during the 100 day strike.

So much for exports; but, what about imports? Obviously, these have also been affected by the West Coast dock strike. A case in point is the Japanese automobiles normally unloaded on the West Coast. These are transported on specially designed ships which have the flexibility to unload in any U.S. port. Although this would involve some delay in delivery schedules, these automobiles can be unloaded in Gulf ports, as they in fact were during the 100 day strike. Because products imported through the West Coast are essentially finished and semi-finished manufactures which have a considerably greater dollar value per ton than the agricultural products and other raw materials exported from the West Coast, the diversion of imports is economically much more feasible than the diversion of exports. Estimates predicated on data available in the Department indicate that the net effect in 1971 on our balance of trade resulting from the 100 day strike was a deficit of $500 million.

MARITIME LOSSES

The renewal of the strike continues to severely affect U.S. flag operators. Their financial losses directly impair our efforts to rebuild the U.S. merchant marine.

As of today, loss of earnings in the longshore segment of the maritime industry resulting from the current strike are estimated to amount to $410,000 per day in losses of wages. During the 100 day strike, direct wage losses to U.S. ships' crews amounted to $5 million, exclusive of fringe benefits. Some 46 U.S. flag vessels and 203 foreign flag vessels were laid up during the peak of the strike's impact resulting in a loss of over 3,000 ship days for U.S. flag vessels alone. When I testified before the House Subcommittee on Labor, only two days ago, I stated that 17 U.S. flag vessels and 69 foreign flag vessels were already strike bound. Today, there are 22 U.S. flag vessels and 71 foreign flag vessels strike bound. The number is growing daily!

DOMESTIC LOSSES

Most of the food supplied to the State of Hawaii normally is shipped from the West Coast ports subject to the strike. During the 100 day strike, food supplies had to be shipped from other ports or by air freight at significant additional expense. Rice, an important food staple in Hawaii, had to be rationed. Retail food prices in Hawaii went up approximately 8 percent in the six week period from July 1, to the date of the wage-price freeze.

Approximately 95 percent of Hawaii's sugar output normally is shipped to the West Coast ports subject to the strike. During the 100 day strike, significant losses were incurred as a result of higher shipping costs to other ports and emergency storage costs for these shipments which were delayed.

I'm sure you are aware that a group of Hawaiian small businessmen have formed "Operation Black Eye" and have brought to Washington a petition signed by 80,000 residents of Hawaii pleading for an immediate termination of this strike to alleviate the critical situation in that State. Considering the fact that the total population of Hawaii is approximately 769,000, we believe that the number of signatures reflects the concern with which Hawaiians view this strike.

The small businessmen who organized "Operation Black Eye" have indicated to the Department of Commerce that the true impact of the strike cannot adequately be measured by statistics, but must also be seen in human terms, in terms of consumers, particularly those in lower income levels, and in terms of small businessmen. The lower income consumer finds himself unable to purchase many necessities because of the extra costs of air freight and the scarcity of products. The small businessman finds himself lacking the resources to weather the financial burdens of the strike. In short, the people of Hawaii see themselves the victims of a situation over which they have no control and for which they are in no way responsible.

Additional losses occurred in other states affected by the strike. Based on state government statistics, we estimate that cargo losses during the 100 day strike amounted to $17.5 million per day through California ports and $6 million per day through Oregon and Washington ports. Losses of $1 million per day were reported in the states of Washington and Oregon in the form of lost wheat and lumber sales alone. Food prices increased in Alaska, prior to the wage price freeze, as a result of having to ship food by truck or from other ports.

The strike also has a severe, if not disastrous, impact on some small nearby port neighborhoods and businesses. The halt in port activity adversely affects small truckers, importers and exporters whose livelihood depends on a steady flow of merchandise and also affects small retail establishments.

In closing, I believe that continuation of the dock strike would be a severe blow to the welfare and economy of this Nation. Accordingly, I urge prompt enactment of Senate Joint Resolution 187.

YOUTH FOR UNDERSTANDING

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I want to pay tribute today to the exchange program for high school and college students, Youth for Understanding. Ever since 1951, Youth for Understanding has played a leadership role in promoting international understanding through a wide-based program of cultural exchanges. The underpinning of the entire program is the belief that a youth's education must involve a living experience in some foreign country. How else can we move toward the kind of international understanding that we have been striving for over centuries?

YFU has grown rapidly and impressively over this short period of time. Since its inception, more than 19,300 students from 47 countries in Europe, Asia, Latin America, and Africa have come to the United States. Since 1956, more than 11,300 American high school students have gone overseas under the auspices of YFU, particularly in the Latin American countries of Bolivia, Guatemala, the Dominican Republic, and Nigeria. Each program has a unique quality that is adjusted to the general character of the community where the YFU participant is living. In addition, there are special programs such as the YFU Chorale and the Community College program which have been a tremendous success.

The admirable record of YFU is greatly due to the work and dedication of Dr. Rachel Andresen, executive director, and all those people who have supported YFU throughout the years. The State Department has also been of great assistance.

Each year the YFU continues to gain momentum. It is an organization for youth and an organization which operates at a youthful pace with a youthful spirit. I congratulate YFU on the fine work it has done and will continue to do.

THE LATE SENATOR CARL HAYDEN, OF ARIZONA

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, one of the men who I have always admired very much is the late Senator Carl Hayden of Arizona. His death last month marked the end of one of the most unusual careers in American politics. He was a distinguished and unusual man.

Senator Hayden began to represent his beloved State of Arizona in the U.S. Congress when that State came into the Union in 1912. He continued with his service in the Senate and had a combined service in the House and Senate of almost threescore years.

The value of public service is not how long we serve, but how well. Senator Hayden served well. It was my privilege to serve on the Committee on Rules and Administration for a number of years with Senator Carl Hayden. I marveled at his memory, his keen mind, his grasp at governmental affairs and world affairs. I often thought that he knew more about the operation of the U.S. Government than any man I have ever met.

Senator Carl Hayden was a kindly man. I never heard him speak harshly of anyone. If Carl Hayden participated in a matter it was for the purpose of helping.

The historians will have ample material in the life and works of Senator Carl Hayden for many volumes. There is so much to write concerning his accomplishments. I would not attempt it here. I merely wish to express my sorrow at his passing and my sympathy to those he has left behind.

The poet, Mattie Richard Tyler, of Washington, was a personal friend of Carl Hayden. Upon his passing she wrote the poem, "The Senate Patriarch Goes Home." Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the poem printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the poem was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE SENATE PATRIARCH GOES HOME—SENATOR CARL HAYDEN, 1877-1972

(By Mattie Richards Tyler)

One winter night, a few brief years ago,
I sat and listened to you reminisce.
Across the street, your Capitol was aglow
With lights; and you were such a part of this

That when you spoke of "going home real soon"—

To Arizona and your friends out there—
I wondered if your thoughts would drift each noon

To Congress, and your Senate desk and chair.

For fifty-six full years, you quietly served
The nation, and the state that you loved best.

Your path, so strewn with honors, never swerved . . .

Through dedicated work you met each test.
Your life is ended; but your work survives
And blossoms in the fields of countless lives.

A CLARIFICATION ON THE RECORD

Mr. BROOKE. Mr. President, some time ago a most controversial document was issued by Congressman Downy's House District Subcommittee concerning an FHA insured rehabilitation project, the Clifton Terrace Apartments located in Washington, D.C. Most of the charges made in that report have been contradicted by the findings of the General Accounting Office and the Department of Housing and Urban Development. Further, the report was disavowed by subcommittee members who never participated in, reviewed, or saw the report prior to its publication.

Yet the report stands as a Government document, and certain inaccuracies contained therein have never been officially refuted. I would like to set the record straight regarding a charge made against a former member of my staff who until recently was the general counsel to Housing Development Corp., the non-profit sponsor of the Clifton Terrace Apartments.

The report made the claim that Miss Marilyn Melkonian had been employed by the Neighborhood Legal Services project, a federally funded program, at the same time she was employed on my staff. This information is not accurate. Miss Melkonian was employed by the Neighborhood Legal Services project from June 18, 1967, to August 31, 1967. She was not employed as a member of my staff until September 9, 1967. I hope this statement for the record will avoid any reference to the inaccuracies of this report in regard to Miss Melkonian in the future.

SUDDEN INFANT DEATH SYNDROME

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, on Tuesday, January 25 one of my constituents, Mr. Saul Goldberg, presented testimony on a little known subject before the Subcommittee on Children and Youth.

Mr. Goldberg is president of the International Guild for Infant Survival, Inc. of Baltimore, Md. The guild was started in November of 1964 by Mr. and Mrs. Saul Goldberg and now has more than seven chapters in the United States and one in Wales.

In his presentation before the subcommittee, Mr. Goldberg discussed the mysterious phenomena of sudden infant death, more commonly called crib death which claims the lives of 10,000 to 15,000 babies. This disease, as the name denotes, strikes suddenly and unexpectedly, and in light of present medical knowledge there is no known way to prevent it. Research has begun, theories advanced; however, very little is known. I am certainly pleased that the subcommittee hearings were held, not only to bring a focus to this disease, but also to stress the fact that additional research is certainly needed. An example of the need for funding is evidenced by the campaign currently embarked upon in my State by the International Guild for Infant Survival to raise $100,000 for medical research. I will certainly support additional research and highly praise the fine work of the International Guild for Infant Survival.

I would also like to point out to my colleagues that the February 8 episode of "Marcus Welby, M.D." will feature an exploration of the sudden infant death syndrome. I congratulate ABC Television for this public service and recommend the program to my colleagues. I also recommend the moving testimony of Mr. Goldberg which follows and also the articles featured in the Baltimore Sun and the Washington Post on the Sudden Infant Death Syndrome.

I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BEFORE THE U.S. SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON CHILDREN AND YOUTH, COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE

JANUARY 25, 1972.

Thank you, Mr. Senator, for this opportunity to exercise my participation in our democratic form of government. Accordingly, I speak before you as a private citizen, as a father for his family, as a parent who has personally experienced the tragedy of Sudden Infant Death, and as President of The International Guild for Infant Survival and Chairman of the International Council for Infant Survival. In all these capacities, I thank you and the Committee for your interest in what we call Sudden Infant Death and for your holding this hearing. On behalf of everyone I represent here today, we greatly and gratefully appreciate your concern for the very lives of our young children.

I need not dwell on the characteristics and details of Sudden Infant Death for I would like to assume we all understand something of its nature and tragedy. But I would like to say a personal word for background purposes.

My family experienced our own Sudden Infant Death tragedy when we suddenly lost our daughter Suzanne on Wednesday, December 4, 1963, a scant 12 days after the tragic assassination of President Kennedy. If you can recall the magnitude of your own shock and our nation's grief at the loss of this great leader, then you have some insight into the magnitude of our own personal shock and grief at the loss of our normal, healthy, beautiful little 2-month-old girl! Multiply this by the thousands of similar sudden deaths of equally precious babies and you begin to obtain some idea of the disastrous proportions and extent of this major problem of infant mortality.

In trying to discover as much as possible about this unknown killer of infants, we were frustrated as individuals to learn that little or nothing was being done anywhere to get to the bottom of this phenomenon, and that very, very few people, including physicians and public health officials, knew anything about it. In fact, many never heard of it before, or had some misconception about it. So, in the true spirit of American togetherness, friends and strangers banded together for common purpose in pursuit of this killer in our midst.

And so The Guild for Infant Survival was founded in Baltimore in late 1964 . . . to fight this killer, to help solve the mystery of Sudden Infant Death, to eradicate it from the face of the earth and save the lives of thousands of infants here in our own country and around the world as well. From the beginning, we established three main purposes: to help families understand about Sudden Infant Death and its ramifications, to educate and arouse the general public to an awareness of its seriousness and scope, to support and encourage medical and scientific interest and activity in the study of this puzzling mystery.

The Guild for Infant Survival has grown to 10 affiliated autonomous groups, 25 regional representatives in various states and communities from coast to coast, plus personal or medical contacts in almost a dozen countries over the globe. The Guild is a membership organization of both stricken parents who know first-hand about Sudden Infant Death and those who have the good fortune to be spared but share our concern—who have a voice in what we do and how we do it. Their work is done on a voluntary, spare-time, unpaid basis. In addition to members and contributors, there are many who serve and support us in a variety of ways individually and through other groups and organizations, so that there are literally thousands of citizens involved with us.

In communities where Guild groups are most active, the problem of Sudden Infant Death is no longer unheard of. For people have come to realize that, instead of sticking their heads in the sand, or ignoring this problem, the way to solve a problem is to face it, honestly . . . squarely . . . meaningfully. At least 4 research projects have been given impetus due to the efforts of our Guild groups, and there may be more. We estimate that Guild contributions directly for Sudden Infant Death research now approximate $30,000 without large corporate, foundation, or public funds, donated by ordinary, wonderful people who really care about our kids.

The Guild reaches out its hand of friendship and its heart full of understanding to hundreds, perhaps thousands of "crib death" families. You can imagine how heavy the burden of self-guilt must hang over the family and anyone else with the baby at the time, and how important it is to relieve that unnecessary weight with information and compassion. Our Guilds bring these parents and the public in closer contact with researchers themselves and their facilities, sponsor meetings with health personnel, and held the first parent-medical conference in 1969.

We have succeeded in bringing our own state health officials to recognize Sudden Infant Death as a legitimate cause of death on medical certificates, to undertake special studies and statistical tabulations, and to call on us in time of need and cooperation. In Maryland, state appropriations to complete the research floor of the new Medical Examiners Building were obtained with Guild help so there would at least be a place in which research could begin, and in which it has.

Our Guild groups are satisfied that we can successfully aid and console the families of these young victims, provided we can expect the cooperation of medical authorities and public health officials, especially in verifying the serious extent of Sudden Infant Death.

Much of this is also true when we reach out to the general public but the need for greater Government participation is more so. This is because the mass media which influence public knowledge and opinion so dramatically and extensively turn to those in a position to know and inform.

In the first few years of Guild for Infant Survival activity, it was very important for us to impress upon those we contacted that there was such a phenomenon as Sudden Infant Death and that it was serious. Although much correspondence was exchanged with Federal health officials and visits made to the National Institutes of Health, we could not obtain a relatively simple written statement acknowledging the true nature and extent of Sudden Infant Death. Nor could we find even one reference to this problem in any available Government publication on health, infant care, or mortality statistics. And I am speaking in general terms, not in specifics more difficult to come by. In fact, it wasn't until a year or two ago that we finally received statements in writing that were pertinent and helpful. I don't think these services of Government, which exist for public good, should be so withheld, and I certainly shudder to think that the National Institutes of Health has a "head in the sand" attitude.

Beyond this, most of the problems we have encountered lie in the direction of skimpy medical activity to stamp out this killer, and our intention as a Government to seriously pursue this goal. In order to ascertain the status of basic knowledge and information known about Sudden Infant Death, our Guild in Baltimore undertook a nationwide survey. A questionnaire concerning Sudden Infant Death was mailed to the chief health official of each of the 50 states and the District of Columbia in June 1971. Within 2 months or so, replies had been received from all but 9 states. Thirty-nine (39) states and the District of Columbia returned completed questionnaires and two states submitted their information in letter form. I should like to refer to the preliminary analysis of this survey in this statement now.

It seems logical to assume that before we attack a problem, we should all understand what the problem is. This involves terminology, definition, description. In the 8 years of our involvement, there is still no uniform, accepted definition, no standardized description—and worse, no universally designated name or term. We are all familiar with the variety of names in current use: Sudden Infant Death, Sudden Unexplained Infant Death, Sudden Death Syndrome, Sudden Death in Infancy, etc. It is difficult to believe that we have yet to take this obvious initial step in official recognition.

Our questionnaire replies revealed 16 different names or phrases being used to identify what is essentially the same phenomenon. "Crib death" was most frequently named, by 20 of the 42 jurisdictions replying; Sudden Infant Death was second with 7 states. Nine (9) states used no official designation at all and 6 states were guided by the certified cause of death or pathological diagnosis. In only 14 states was a single designation employed, but there were still 7 different terms used among these 14 states! Nine (9) states used two terms and 4 states used 3. This illustrates a confusing situation in naming the problem we are talking about and trying to solve.

The Guild for Infant Survival recommends use of the term "Sudden Infant Death" in cooperation with other parent groups. To use "crib death" implies death in the crib, but this is not always true and may be misleading if officially adopted. It may, however, have value in colloquial usage. Sudden Infant Death is simple, direct, and easily understood by stricken parents and scientific researchers.

Along with a name should be a definition. No uniform or standard phraseology exists. I understand that just recently the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development has circulated a suggested one. But earlier this year, the Guild delved into this shortcoming with our medical advisors and proposes the following working definition: The death of an ostensibly healthy infant or young child which occurs suddenly and unexpectedly and which remains unexplained after post-mortem examination.

Before any name and definition agreed upon can be of value, their use must be recognized and accepted by the state filing information. In our survey, 5 states replied that no term is acceptable. Twenty-seven (27) states said they did recognize and accept one of the terms but 8 more qualified their affirmative response; for example, only if no other cause could be found or if the certifying authority used it.

Another fundamental piece of information needed before a logical attack can be made on Sudden Infant Death is, we think, to know the frequency and its relation to other health problems and causes of infant mortality. We all know about the International Classification of Diseases and Causes of Death (Adapted) and its detailed classification of all health problems with accompanying code number identification. One would expect to find some specific category within this system for our subject today, Sudden Infant Death (or some related terminology). There is none. Yet if we look far enough, we find a catch-all category of ill-defined causes or conditions.

Our survey revealed use of two such categories in this section frequently mentioned by state health officials. The state of Indiana put it the best way: "Sudden Infant Death is recorded in accordance with the 8th Revision International Classification of Diseases and with instruction from the National Center on Vital Statistics. SID is classified in the Symptoms and Ill-Defined Conditions Category '795 Sudden death (cause unknown).' A crib death diagnosis is charged to '796.2 Found dead (cause unknown).' If a more specific cause is indicated the death is charged to that category; e.g., interstitial pneumonitis, asphyxia, etc. . . ." In our discussion here, I think it is agreed among the experts that Sudden Infant Death and crib death are one and the same. Yet the International Classification is used to split these into two parts (above). Note also that neither category makes any reference to age. Adults as well as infants can and do become tabulated in both classifications. In the Guild survey, 8 states use both categories, 18 states use one or the other, 4 states use some variation of the two, 2 use a supplemental number, a couple of states use the accidental death category (E913); one used other conditions of newborn (778.9) for crib deaths under 28 days. Thirty-one (31) states mentioned some code number, 5 mentioned none, 5 were indefinite. Mention was also made of the imprecise or vague specification as to age, as not being sufficient for Sudden Infant Death.

The Guild for Infant Survival believes it is important for the National Center for Health Statistics to officially propose before the forthcoming Revisions Committee of the International Classification of Diseases a separate and specific classification term and code number for Sudden Infant Death. With the Federal health authorities showing the way for the states—as formally proposed by resolution of the state assembly of California—this revision would be a monumental step in the right direction.

This special classification and coding is essential to the accurate state tabulations of crib deaths. Fifteen (15) states reported no official tabulation in state health statistics; 25 said they do, especially when age is considered, but noted variables. Minnesota responded when asked if SID's are tabulated in state statistics: "Yes but, the variations in methods of certification and coding lead to some confusion. ICDA 795 should include the total—but some are coded 796.2 for various reasons." Tennessee said: "Those rules for selecting and classifying the causes of death are quite sensitive to the manner in which the medical certification is completed. Thus, in interpreting data regarding cause of death it is important to remember that a slight variance in the statement of cause of death may result in an appreciable difference in the cause to which the death is assigned by using the standard rules."

North Dakota noted the extra effort required: "... No separate tabulation has been made of 'crib deaths' or 'sudden death of infants' other than the fact that these would be in the total of 'Ill-defined' causes. To tabulate differently would require individual examination of each infant death certificate by a qualified medical person which service is not available to the Division of Vital Statistics (N. Dak.) at this time."

The National Institute of Child Health and Human Development is fond of quoting statistics which we believe are, in reality, too low. References are continually being made to projections based on 2 to 3 sudden infant deaths per 1,000 live births, to rationalize estimates as low as 7500 and as high as only 12,000. We believe even the higher estimate to be too low in the overall significance of the problem. Our reasons are these: Projections for the entire country are based on only 2-3 study areas like Seattle and Philadelphia. Yet the Chief Medical Examiner of Maryland noted the Sudden Infant Death rate in Baltimore as 6 per 1,000 live births. Since we are told there is a correlation between Sudden Infant Death incidence and general infant mortality, it would seem that SID incidences would be higher in areas with greater infant mortality, as in the South, thus increasing the total annual number.

Then there is the problem of finding and tabulating every Sudden Infant Death. Even as successful and enlightening as we have been in Maryland, there are still occasions when there is no official record of a Sudden Infant Death which we have discovered privately, as through a hospital or the family itself or a relative or neighbor. It is likely these "hidden" cases are more frequent in less enlightened communities. It is not difficult to accomplish this, especially where affluence and influence coincide. Finally, no consideration of this syndrome can be complete without regard for the phenomenon of "near" Sudden Infant Deaths . . . when normal, healthy infants suddenly are found near death but for some unexplained reason pull out of this situation, recover and return to normal. Yet competent medical examination cannot explain this strange occurrence. These, too, should be included in the SID count. For all these reasons, our Guilds and our local advisors believe it is quite possible the frequency of Sudden Infant Death could reach as high as 25,000 infants/yr.

For all this concern, with all these uncertainties and lack of knowledge, relatively little research funding has been granted by the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development (NICHD) down through the years. Here again, we have never been able to ascertain the exact extent of research funding. This continuing inability to pin down specific information, which should be available to the public, may lead to suspicious conclusions.

As of last year, the Guild was able only to estimate the extent of specific SID research funding by NICHD at about $700,000 in the 8 years of Institute existence. It is also conceivable at the time that up to 200,000 American babies were lost to SID in 8 years.

Simple arithmetic reveals that only $3.50 per lost child was being spent. Even if we conceded the Institute's upper estimate of 12,000 SID losses per year, we would still be spending only about $7.00 each.

In an honest attempt to prove or disprove our $700,000 figure, we asked the Institute to provide us with a yearly breakdown of funding since its inception. It would seem logical that an index of research grants by title or specific subject would yield this data conveniently. Yet it took more than 2 months to obtain these statistics, and then only for the 1971 fiscal year. The information sheet listed 43 grants totalling $1.8 million relating to infant mortality/SID, but only one specifically for Sudden Infant Death of $46,000 (or $2-4 per child). In 1970, there was only one grant, for $33,000 ($1.50-$3 per child). Yet the total NICHD budget rose from $76 million to $94 million in 1971, with a $5.7 million increase for support of general child health research, which includes crib death.

It is our position that the problem of Sudden Infant Death is too devastating and horrible to be explained away by 43 funding grants which may indirectly relate to the problem—that the magnitude and significance of the problem are so great as to demand commensurate and specific funding.

This lack of substantial funding is further explained by Government officials by a lack of "meritorious research ideas" or "qualified researchers." There are many potential researchers ready and willing to investigate SID in new and potentially promising directions. Although they may not meet the established standards of scrutinizing study sections, these are respected men of competence and position in their own fields and are worthy of a chance to explore their theories. It just may be that such a bizarre problem may require a bizarre or non-conformist approach, instead of standard or restricted technique.

We say this for two good reasons: First, we must always keep in mind the lives which are lost every day. I find it indecent and inhuman to wait for just the proper meritorious ideas to come along for consideration while our babies are being struck down before our eyes day in and day out. Second, the funds to support research are public funds, derived from us the taxpayers. The very fact that these same taxpayers in many numbers voluntarily and anxiously contribute their own monies to our private efforts to fund research serves as a mandate to public officials to put their taxes to use to save lives now!

Our proposal is sensible and meaningful: Establish a certain substantial sum of money earmarked specifically for Sudden Infant Death research. Invite all interested researchers to apply for funding. Then choose those most capable and promising for funding. Make the most of what there is now; don't wait for an ideal who may never come. Only in this way will we know that our Government really cares about our babies!

Down through the years, NICHD has calmed us with repeated phrases that Sudden Infant Death has a high priority for attention and action. That it is the greatest single killer of infants from one month to one year of age. And more. Looking back, however, relatively little has been undertaken and even less has been accomplished. It is almost as if there were no such entity as Sudden Infant Death if you search the records and literature . . . even though thousands of empty cribs, tiny graves, and broken hearts bear mute evidence of the total destruction of this killer in our midst.

Is this, then the record of a Government which serves the people? In seeking to solve every problem of man's development from prenatal care to geriatrics, does a problem like Sudden Infant Death get lost in the overwhelming responsibilities of this comprehensive Health Institute? Is Government's priority and present preoccupation with birth control and population growth conflicting with the saving of the lives of newborn babies? The time has come for our Government to back up its words and intentions with dollars and sense! We spend millions in research to perfect birth control devices, but paltry thousands to save new human lives we love so much. Where is our sense of values?

Experience indicates that Government does not act on its own initiative to solve serious problems, but only reacts when some unexpected, disastrous episode compels it to positive action. Are these daily unexpected disastrous episodes too commonplace to attract urgent, serious action? Are these infant tragedies therefore being compounded by inaction?

We of The Guild for Infant Survival cannot keep silent and watch more children die in vain without lifting a finger and raising our voices. We cannot ignore these daily tragedies happening before our very eyes . . . watching these precious babies slip through our hearts and homes! And America cannot afford to sit idly by while millions of hours of manpower and talent which could be put to peaceful and productive purpose are buried forever.

These departed children can no longer speak for themselves . . . so we of The Guild for Infant Survival speak for them, so they shall not have died in vain. We come to plead for the lives of future generations who face this same horrible threat of sudden death at the very beginning of life.

No one can say who will be touched in the weeks and months ahead. We do know there will be many; unfortunately, far too many. How much longer will our babies—yours and mine—die so tragically and so unnecessarily? How much do we really value life itself?

Today, you have a golden opportunity given to very few: to save thousands of lives every year in every future generation of mankind . . . by considering and acting on what we have said here today . . . to speed the day when no more babies will die . . .

John Donne said it best:

"No man is an island, entire of itself. Every man is a piece of the Continent, a part of the main . . . Any man's death diminishes me, because I am involved in Mankind. And therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls, it tolls for thee . . ."

THE MYSTERY OF CRIB DEATH

Among the many baffling mysteries of the human body, few remain as persistently unsolved as crib death. The disease is known medically as sudden infant death syndrome (SIDS). Estimates vary on how many victims die every year; the National Institute of Child Health and Human Development believes between 7,400 and 10,500 occur annually, while two private groups—the National Foundation for Sudden Infant Death and the Guild for Infant Survival—put the figures between 10,000 and 20,000. Whatever the number, little argument exists that SIDS is a definite disease and is the number one cause of death in infants after the first week of life. Mystery is present because it can neither be predicted or prevented. The infant is usually under six months of age. Typically, the baby is healthy and normal, though sometimes a common cold may be present; he or she has been put to bed routinely but some hours later, with neither a cry or an indication of pain, is found dead.

On Tuesday, the Senate Subcommittee on Children and Youth held one day of hearings on crib death. One expected and much needed result of these hearings is that greater public attention will now be focused on this dangerous and widespread disease. Dr. Abraham Bergman of Children's Orthopedic Hospital in Seattle and president of the National Foundation for Sudden Infant Death, believes that the urgent problem about SIDS "is ignorance among the medical profession and lay public. In the vast majority of communities, parents who lose children to SIDS are treated as criminals . . . Many medical examiners and coroners are still calling the disease suffocation or a variety of other names." In addition to normal reactions of grief, parents of SIDS victims often suffer guilt or emotional pain unmatched by other diseases. "The toll of broken families around the country for sudden infant death is shocking," said Dr. Bergman.

As a beginning sign of congressional interest in SIDS, the hearings were useful. As Sen. Walter F. Mondale, the subcommittee chairman noted, it was only three years ago that crib death was finally identified and described as a specific disease. What needs to be done now is for NIH to examine its research possibilities, first to discover the cause of SIDS and then to see how it may be prevented. Neither goal will be easy to reach, but with annual deaths ranging in the 10,000 area, the reduction of infant mortality should at least be a major concern of both Congress and the government. No one can deny that SIDS is surely a major concern to tens of thousands of parents.

CRIB-DEATH STUDY NEEDS $100,000

A Baltimore-based organization dedicated to exploring the mysteries of sudden infant death has embarked on a campaign to raise $100,000 for medical research.

The drive is being led by Mr. and Mrs. Saul Goldberg, a Baltimore couple who founded the International Guild for Infant Survival in November, 1964, less than a year after the sudden, unexplained death of their 2-month-old daughter.

There has been little research into sudden infant death—also known as crib death—and its cause and prevention are unknown. A recent Senate hearing noted there are 10,000 deaths annually and that the federal government spent only $46,000 in 1971 for research into crib deaths.

In a typical situation, a mother enters her child's room in the morning and finds the infant dead in his crib. There is no clear medical reason for the child's death and the parents, wrongfully, often blame themselves for the tragedy.

In the Baltimore area last year there were 94 deaths attributed to the sudden infant death syndrome; statewide, the total was more than 150.

Because of the lack of a uniform reporting system, the failure of doctors to list the syndrome on death certificates and the lack of experience on the part of some coroners, the Goldbergs feel the problem is grossly underreported. They estimate the national death total at 25,000 annually.

For years, Mr. and Mrs. Goldberg said in a recent interview, they labored under the belief that, once made aware of the syndrome, people would identify with the tragedy and support research aimed at its elimination.

But this has not happened.

"CAN'T HIDE FROM IT"

"People clam up about it instead of reaching out to the problem," Mr. Goldberg said. "There is tragedy in this world, people must realize it, they can't hide from it," he added.

Consequently, the couple announced their intention to abandon the organization's "low profile" and begin soliciting help from charitable organizations, corporate foundations and "affluent and influential" persons in the community.

At the same time they are planning a campaign to attract donations from persons in stores, offices and shopping centers. They will do this through posters advertising a February 8 episode of the "Marcus Welby, M.D." television series in which the sudden infant death syndrome will be explored.

Mr. Goldberg takes credit for initiating the show in a letter he mailed to the show's producers in the summer of 1970 suggesting a program on crib death.

They have no deadline for obtaining the $100,000 but said most of it will go to Dr. Russell S. Fisher, the state's chief medical examiner, whose interest in crib death goes back 20 years.

Dr. Fisher, who participated in the interview, said the money will be applied to basic research on the problem.

MANY HAD MINOR INFECTIONS

Dr. Fisher suspects that the syndrome is connected with the development of the infant's immunological system to ward off infection and disease.

Most of the deaths occur in the third or fourth month of life and sharply drop after the eighth month, he noted. It is during this period that the baby loses the immunological system inherited from its mother and begins to develop its own system.

Sudden infant death may be due to a defect in the development of this system which would render the infant fatally susceptible to relatively minor infections, he said. Many crib death babies have had minor infections upon autopsy, he added.

If these defects could be spotted, Dr. Fisher said, all children would be examined at four months of age and, if they possess the defect, their immunological defense system could be bolstered, say, by serum injections from the mother.

Dr. Fisher said it would take $100,000-a-year for five years to hire a staff of immunologists and immuno-chemists to probe this theory. "We don't have the money to get the talent," he said.

Mr. and Mrs. Goldberg hope, at least, to get this project initiated.

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY

Mr. COOK. Mr. President, last week I received a letter from a constituent concerning the designation of the first week in February as "We Appreciate Our Young People Week" in Kentucky. Let me be among the first to applaud this attitude. A healthy respect and concern for the young people of this country is an important first step in the eradication of many of our juvenile problems. This recognition serves as a fitting introduction to my remarks today regarding current juvenile delinquency legislation.

Over the past 3 years my position on the Senate Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency has made me increasingly aware of the inadequate attempts on the Federal level to deal with the root causes of juvenile delinquency. The current overcrowding in our correctional facilities and courts is a direct result of our inexcusable neglect in the area. Undeniably, the most effective and efficient approach to any problem is to address its cause rather than simply its symptoms. For this reason I am convinced that a strong and broad program of delinquency prevention should be a major priority of this session of Congress.

The Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee has recently held hearings on two pieces of legislation in this area. Both are aimed at delinquency prevention and both have met opposition on the grounds that the authority to implement and fund projects such as they propose already exists. This authority is scattered through a wide variety of types of legislation and effects a number of different agencies and bureaus. For the most part, these titles have received little, if any, funding or development. Therefore, while delinquency prevention programs have been recognized as important and authorizations provided for, they have not received the funds and priority which would make them viable, working programs.

This is a situation which I personally deplore. Until someone is willing to take the initiative in developing these various pieces of legislation into a broad and effective delinquency prevention program, I will feel compelled to support the scattered pieces of prevention legislation that come before this session of Congress.

My concern today, however, is with the one preventive approach which I feel holds the only real promise in dealing with the problems of today's youth. That approach is basically one of helping kids to help themselves. It is exemplified by the efforts of YDDPA, the Youth Development and Delinquency Prevention Administration set up in HEW under the Juvenile Delinquency Prevention and Control Act of 1968, in its organization of Youth Service Bureaus in special pilot projects throughout the country. As a concept, it is quite simple: To go into an area, determine what public and private services are then available to the youth of that area, and to set up a system whereby these various groups and agencies work closely together in their efforts, complementing and cross-referencing children in need to each other. It is the natural—and quite logical—approach. It has, however, pointed out striking deficiencies in certain types of services badly needed by youth in most of these pilot communities.

One of these areas is the provision of alternatives to the juvenile justice system, alternatives which supply young people with the understanding and counsel that will keep them out of the juvenile justice system. Innumerable young people each day find themselves in police stations, courtrooms, and detention centers across the country, the perpetrators of no real crime beyond that of status: The truant, the incorrigible, the neglected, the runaway. Neither the police, the judiciary or the welfare systems in most of these areas have the time or money to help these kids. Their problems unresolved, these young people are too often hurried home or into juvenile institutions, only to reglut police stations, courts, and correctional institutions with their return.

In my years as a county judge, I saw far too many of these young people accumulating unnecessary police records and making return visits to our juvenile justice system. Unquestionably, many of them did not even belong there to begin with. The need to broaden and strengthen our efforts to help these children before they become involved in more serious sorts of crime is evidenced each day, as our courts, police departments, and juvenile institutions become increasingly overburdened.

The Runaway Youth Act, which I originally cosponsored in November of last year, is such an attempt. Its thrust is delinquency prevention through the encouragement of alternatives to our existing juvenile justice system. It has the support of police departments, juvenile judges, social workers, and national and local private groups throughout the country. It is a simple and relatively narrow piece of legislation, authorizing funds to HEW for grants and the provision of technical assistance "for the purpose of developing local facilities to deal with the immediate needs of runaways in a manner which is outside the law enforcement structure of the juvenile justice system." I feel, however, that its impact in the area of delinquency prevention will be extensive.

For this reason, I wish to clarify a number of points regarding this bill which I feel to be important.

In the first place, the shelter to be provided is only temporary. We are not encouraging our young people to leave home but giving them the immediate understanding and counsel which they so badly need in adjusting to life and the pressures of growing up. These shelters are meant to help bridge the gap between parent and child and to provide our youth with a place to go when leaving home seems their only alternative. As recent hearing testimony has shown, the average runaway is under 14 and part of the white working class. He is not the disgruntled older youth of middle America seeking adventure. He leaves home, because something is very wrong there. The greatest service we can do them is to respect them and help them respect themselves.

This brings me to my second point. How do you help these youngsters help themselves? What sorts of counseling and services do you provide them? Each person and each situation is different. Likewise, each area of the country is different. The variety of projects which have sprung up at the local level in response to local needs is indicative of the type of programs that are needed, locally initiated, locally sponsored and tailored to local needs. I fully support the more comprehensive efforts of national organizations such as the YWCA and Travelers' Aid along this line. I do feel, however, that the most effective programs are those designed to fill a gap in available youth services on the local level, projects funded by both public and private community groups. It is my sincere hope, therefore, that this piece of legislation will eventually fund, on a limited basis, a wide variety of shelter homes and counseling facilities, encouraging local initiative in broadening and strengthening services available to troubled youth in any area.

This bill is meant to fund a broad range of programs, to complement existing services and projects and to retain flexibility in a locality's response to delinquency prevention outside its juvenile justice system. It does not offer any comprehensive solution to our juvenile problems; it encourages each locality to find its own answers. I believe it offers far more than a superficial glance at its title, the Runaway Youth Act, can convey. For this reason I urge both the Members of the Judiciary Committee and the rest of Congress to carefully consider its eventual passage.

To this end I ask unanimous consent to have included in the RECORD a number of letters and articles which I have received regarding the Runaway Youth Act.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BALTIMORE, Md.,
January 14, 1972.

Re: S. 2829, the Runaway Youth Act of 1971.
Senator MARLOW W. COOK,
U.S. Senate,
Committee on the Judiciary,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR COOK: I am in receipt of your letter of December 21, 1971 enclosing a copy of the above Bill which has been introduced by you and Senator Birch Bayh.

I have read the Bill carefully and all of its explanatory material and must say that I totally and wholeheartedly endorse this legislation. Statistics are hard to come by on how many runaway youths we have each year in a given community—those who come to the attention of the authorities are, I fear, merely the tip of the iceberg. As the presiding judge in the Juvenile Court of Baltimore City, I can say that the best estimate of the total number of runaways each year in our city would be several thousand.

I think it is readily apparent what the ramifications and consequences of this extensive problem are. It is a problem that has always been with any society, but I think that it is clear that it is one which has grown very sharply over the last number of years—a growth far out of proportion of the rising juvenile population. This can be attributed to a wide variety of factors—the increased alienation between the young and their elders, the drug culture, greater mobility, more maturity and many other factors. For the purposes of your Bill it is not as important to pinpoint the causes as it is to pinpoint the effects.

Each of these youngsters is troubled in his own way—some to a more severe degree than others—but each needs a kind, firm and understanding hand which the child does not feel is available at home and probably not in his school either. There is practically no other place where the child feels he can turn to reach out for this hand. The very meager facilities which exist for these children are taxed many, many times beyond the breaking point. These youngsters do not need punishment—they need sound and proper counseling and guidance. Failure to provide this will be to reject scores of thousands of fine young people each year and in so many of these cases cause them irreparable damage. It is only through the establishment of the type of resources which your Bill proposes that we can attempt to meet in a meaningful way the very real problems of our troubled youth.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT I. H. HAMMERMAN.

YOUTH HELP CENTER,
Chicago, Ill., January 17, 1972.

DEAR SENATOR COOK: The Youth Help Center of the Grace Lutheran Church is presently in its fourth year of operation, and as such is the oldest runaway agency in the state of Illinois. I have been following the progress of your bill, and some of the hearings as reported in the newspapers.

Enclosed you will find some older literature that we have that describes some of the things you seek to know about our program. I am aware that you have done excellent research in your bill, as we have spoken with the people of Runaway House in Washington about your bill. I do not wish to be redundant, and hope to make this letter short so that we are not tooting our own horn with data you have already encountered.

The bill is two years late. Chicago has always had large numbers of runaways, primarily from the suburbs. Lately, with the increase in community youth centers, primarily of drug orientation, there has been a decrease in the numbers coming through. The change has been from a white suburban youth of middle class parents to the white, urban youth of working class parents. The cases have been more complex due to more legal complications—from schools, from marital situations (unknown custody), and from past recorded with law enforcement officials. We have always had great cooperation from the local police.

From our annual report, you will notice that we are attempting to institute an approach similar to that of your bill with a group home. In 1969, the YHC operated a group home for 7 months, but was forced to close it due to inadequate funding. Our experience has been that without concrete temporary alternatives in housing to offer youth, so they have a reasonable chance to expect parents permission and some help, most will turn and go back onto the streets for their survival. I cannot overemphasize the need for the homes that your bill will provide for. Time and time again a youth's situation has crumbled due to the simple fact we were unable to provide him with an alternative living environment for only a few weeks, while he was able to put his own head back together without the pressures of the home environment.

This bill will begin to provide the alternatives that have so long been sought by many youth agencies around this city, and the staff of the Youth Help Center gives it our whole hearted recommendation. It is truly heartening for us to see some of our legislators who are real enough to have some contact with this real problem that is now beginning to affect even the working class youth in greater proportions.

Celebrate life!

MARK THENNES.

THE RUNAWAY PROGRAM, YOUTH HELP CENTER—GRACE LUTHERAN CHURCH

Although this program began as the Grace Lutheran Runaway Program, it has always crossed all lines of race, creed, or color, both in its staff as well as those it sought to help. It was renamed Youth Help Center Association in recognition of the fact that it is, and always has been, non-ethnic and non-denominational in character.

Since June 1968, in an innovative action program Grace Lutheran Church Runaway Program has sought out and worked with more than 1500 runaway juveniles of all faiths and social backgrounds. Working with a nominal budget, this program included extensive utilizations of volunteer services, while providing emotional support and encouragement when a teen is afraid to seek help from established social agencies. By creating an atmosphere with which the teens could identify, we created a place where he (or she) could feel safe . . . a place where he could find help within the framework of a lawful society.

As word-of-mouth publicity spread among the young people, juveniles contemplating running away from their families began calling the center. Through these contacts, other innovative measures for runaway prevention were added to the program. Several hundred juveniles, not included in the actual runaway program, were given runaway prevention counseling, with referral to cooperating agencies when possible. The program has reached approximately 3000 young people, half of whom are runaway juveniles.

Key elements of the program include activities such as:

Counseling for runaways and pre-runaways.

24 hour manned crises phone.

Liaison with police and other agencies.

Drop-in center.

Outreach into the community.

Artistic, musical and cultural activities.

Youth centered folk services.

This program began because we saw juveniles in need who didn't have a place to go. We started with:

An almost instinctive approach.

A basic philosophy—contact and help. We added prevention and cure.

A philosophy that the helped must become the helpers, and we emphasized that fact during any counseling.

We had no:

Guidelines to follow because there was no successful long-term program dealing with alienated youth.

Money to give us time to analyze the dynamics when we were able to do what responsible established social agencies using traditional methods had been unable to do.

In today's society, as long as a juvenile refuses to stay at home he is either a fugitive or a prisoner. Neither circumstance is beneficial to anyone. Despite these deterrents, if a teen becomes sufficiently desperate about his home situation, real or imagined, he will run away from that situation.

Increased force and control will only lead to further overtaxing of present agency resources. It will result in more bitterness by young people toward adult authority in general . . . their parents and law enforcement people in particular. A runaway's respect for the law will be greatly enhanced when efforts are made to deal with his feelings and needs, instead of only his actions.

ANN LANDERS: YOUR BASIC INCORRIGIBLE

DEAR ANN LANDERS: Our 17-year-old son left home last June because in his words he wanted to be a hippie. He lived with friends all over the country, bumming from one place to another, getting kicked out by parents regularly. Now he has come home, stone broke, hair down to his shoulders, smelling like a six-week-old hamburger.

My husband and I talked it over and decided he could live here but he'd have to clean himself up and stop running around nights. He had been out until 2 and 3 a.m. every morning with a couple of creepy kids who look and smell just like he does. Our son informed us in very plain language that he has no intention of meeting any of our conditions and we can't throw him out because the law says we are responsible for him until he is 21.

The entire family is in a constant state of tension because of this boy. He does whatever he pleases with no regard for anyone. What can we do? Please come up with an answer.—Lake George, N.Y. Parents.

DEAR L.G.: You have just handed me the most difficult question of the century. Thanks a lot.

First let me assure you that your son is as sick of himself as you are. He is angry, insecure, rudderless and miserable. A hostile kid is a troubled kid. Since there is no communication between him and you, I suggest an intermediary, someone the boy can talk to—a physician, a clergyman or a counselor. This boy needs therapy but it can't be forced on him. He must want it.

He is right when he says you cannot throw him out because he's a minor. You can, however, put him in a detention home—which I do NOT, repeat NOT, recommend—if he becomes unmanageable. Most detention homes are factories that produce hardened criminals. Your son's recalcitrance and hostility did not develop overnight so don't expect miracles. Be patient and remember that the child who is least lovable needs love the most.

Re: Senate Bill No. 2829, the Runaway Youth Act.

HON. MARLOW W. COOK,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: We are extremely impressed with the depth of your interest in the problems of our youth population.

Looking Glass, presently a division of Travelers Aid, started about two years ago. Its origins, while small and all volunteer, grew quickly to include paid professional and paraprofessional staff augmented by a volunteer staff of 40.

Those of us who have been a part of Looking Glass since its inception have been astounded at its growth and can only account for it in terms of need. During the past 23 months, we have served over 2,000 adolescents and their families.

I am enclosing some background information about the center and a copy of a preliminary critique from Northwestern University for your review.

While our agency is located in a familial setting, we do not provide housing at the center location. We have found that the use of emergency foster homes (specialized in the care of adolescents) provides a positive experience during crisis and is helpful in further determining a plan for the youngster beyond the crisis point.

We feel the need for both kinds of alternatives, the runaway house and the use of runaway centers and foster homes. It would seem logical that in serving the complex needs of youth, more than one kind of program be developed in their interest. This we feel provides a better selection of alternatives than presently exist.

In terms of comments and criticisms on the Runaway Youth Act as it presently is written, kindly allow me to comment point by point.

Under Section 2 beginning "The Congress hereby finds that—":

We are in general agreement with Sections 1, 2, 3, 4 and in specific agreement with 5 & 6. We have long felt that placing a "criminal status" on a juvenile with "runaway syndrome" is not appropriate, and that in some way this particular area of problem solving should not be under the jurisdiction of the police department and the courts unless there are specific acts of delinquency involved during the runaway episode.

Under Title I:

We fully support the narrative as described in Sections 101 & 102. Under specifics (a) (b) we would recommend the word "house" be changed to "program" throughout the Bill. As we indicated earlier, while we do not use a formalized "house" setting, we find our program using foster homes as a creative alternative to the institutionalization process which a network of houses might perpetuate. Furthermore, let me again reiterate the need for both our client and in-residence centers to serve the needs of adolescent youth.

In Section (2) of Section 102:

While we would agree that a maximum of 20 is appropriate in a shelter setting, we would like to point out that the involvement of foster parents facilitates a greater number of emergency placements at a lesser expense. Although most of our foster parents do not receive payment for care, when there is money available either through the natural parents or through the state Illinois Department of Children and Family Services, a payment not to exceed $3.50/night is made. Based on a cost accounting of in-residence centers, the average cost of sheltering a youngster in an in-residence center is approximately 40% more on a per diem basis over a year's period of time.

Again, we would support the development of an adequate plan according to the best interest of the child. We would like to point out however, there are a small number of occasions when it is impossible to contact parents. We recommend that this Bill provide for authorized licensed child placement agencies not to be in jeopardy under the law when it becomes necessary for the agency to act in loco parentis because contact with parents within a given period of time is not possible.

Item (4):

Of course, while we support the context of the provision, our concern lies in how to achieve "proper relations" with the law enforcement personnel. With most youth agencies already considered suspect by police departments, we would hope legislation would not reinforce already reluctant attitudes on the part of youth serving agencies or the police department.

Item (5):

Again, while supporting this provision we would hesitate to see a limit placed on the distance from the center in terms of an involvement of youth and family in after care counselling or family therapy. It would seem more appropriate if the decision was made by the client and/or his family.

Item (6):

Our only recommendation would be to phrase the provision to include the word confidential so that the rights of clients and their families are not in any way placed in jeopardy.

Section (7):

While the importance of accurate data collection and research cannot be denied, our concern is that the word "goals" implies "concretes" which are not always visible during the time of contact in youth serving agencies. Long term speculation based on empirical study would indicate to us that "concretes" are not possible much before a service is about 3 years old. We feel the intent of such a provision needs clarification to prevent misinterpretation by personnel in the Department of HEW.

We have further comment on (8) and (9).

Sections 103-107 inclusive have our support with no comment at this time.

In terms of comments and recommendations on Title II:

While we recognize the need for comprehensive study, we would implore Congress not to duplicate existing studies. The Secretary of HEW should be ordered to gather all existing information and research presently being conducted nationwide and evaluate the findings before further study.

We would not be supportive of an appropriation of $\frac{1}{2}$ million for primary research proposed which in fact may already exist. In fact, that amount of budget appropriation could adequately fund 4 or 5 centers such as Looking Glass in Chicago alone, with each center doing its own research and being able to facilitate services to 1-2,000 youth per annum each.

Again, in summation, comprehensive study of the runaway population is imperative. Beyond that, it seems that a great deal of study of the myriad of youth serving agencies that have sprung up nationwide in the past 3 years would be useful in further determining appropriate services to adolescent youth and families by the Department of HEW.

As a final comment, we feel that the origin and development of the Looking Glass/Travelers Aid model can serve as a model in other communities that do not choose to have a "house" per se in their locale. Our model, using a center location, and involving the participation of foster parents and a large group of volunteers in key positions of responsibility creates a setting in which service can be rendered and the community involved concurrently in working out problem situations in neighborhoods, schools and other youth programs.

In conclusion, we would hope to be invited to participate in hearings to the Committee should they take place, and that all the senators would use such hearings to further make the general public aware of the severity of the situation of runaway children nationwide.

Respectfully,

Mrs. GERDA FLANIGAN,
Project Director.
Mrs. BETTY GORDON,
Executive Director.

PROVIDING CARE AND COUNSEL FOR RUNAWAYS

We don't hear so much these days about that phenomenon of the 1960's, the teen-age runaway, but it's been estimated that one million youngsters are still running away from home each year. And that's why Indiana's Senator Bayh and Kentucky's Senator Cook are sponsoring legislation in Congress that would provide $10 million for local government agencies or private non-profit groups to help these young people.

The idea is to set up a chain of "runaway houses" across the nation, places where the youths could seek temporary shelter and receive some counseling before being persuaded, one hopes, to return home and try again. The staffs also would try to see that the runaway and his family get more assistance after the return in an effort to cure the causes of flight.

Similar facilities already are in existence in some cities, but most are underfinanced and only scratch the surface of the problem. And as was evident from testimony given to Senator Bayh's subcommittee last week, programs like two in Southern Indiana could get a big boost from this kind of federal aid. A Clark County judge spoke of his rehabilitation work with juvenile delinquents, 10 per cent of whom are runaways, and a Jeffersonville probation officer told of the use made of the Clark-Floyd youth opportunity center by children who have left home.

Wherever the "shelter and counsel" approach has been tried, it has seemed to work. Every parent—past, present or future—must know in his heart that the two Senators are on the right track.

CLARK OFFICIALS SUPPORT BILL TO HELP RUNAWAYS

(By Frank Fox)

Clark County officials were to tell their juvenile delinquency story to a U.S. Senate subcommittee today, and they had a five-year report to back up their testimony.

Superior Court Judge Warren W. Martin Jr. and Chief Probation Officer Mrs. C. B. Barthold were to appear before a subcommittee investigating juvenile delinquency. Chairman of the group is Indiana Sen. Birch Bayh.

Bayh and Kentucky Sen. Marlow Cook are co-sponsors of a bill that would arrange housing and rehabilitation services across the country for apprehended juvenile runaways. The Indiana Democrat and the Kentucky Republican propose that the federal government grant funds to organizations outside of the law-enforcement structure and juvenile justice system to deal with an "alarming increase" in juveniles leaving home without parental permission.

The bill, called the Runaway Youth Act of 1971, would be financed by the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare annually, beginning in fiscal year 1973.

Judge Martin and Mrs. Barthold, who yesterday released portions of a report covering juvenile court activities in Clark County during 1966, 1970 and 1971, said they are in favor of the proposed bill. It closely parallels what his Superior Court—which has exclusive jurisdiction over juveniles in Clark County—has been doing for some time, Martin said.

In a joint statement prepared for the subcommittee meeting, Martin and Mrs. Bar-thold said that "the bill comes closer to the real needs of runaway children in this country than any other piece of legislation proposed up to this time."

Martin and Mrs. Barthold in their report to the subcommittee included data from 1966 through 1971 showing that the percentage of runaway youths they handled ranged from 7.7 per cent of the total caseload in 1969 to 18.5 per cent in 1967. According to the report, 10.9 per cent of the 1,426 juveniles handled last year by the Clark County probation office were runaways.

In the subcommittee report Judge Martin also described his court's recently established intensive probation and foster-home programs as "alternatives to incarceration" concepts. He feels these concepts should be considered by any agency or committee charged with setting up interstate shelter houses if the act is passed. "In fact, both programs are partially funded with federal money," Martin said.

Preliminary figures from the five-year comparative study show, among other things, the delinquent behavior by teenage girls increased in 1971.

Some other statistics the two Clark County officials were to present to the Senate subcommittee and which will be included in the annual and 5-year comparative study are:

The number of juveniles referred to the Clark County Juvenile Court during 1971 is up almost 90 per cent over the 1966 total and 16 per cent above the 1970 total. The increase in 1970 over 1966 was 66 per cent.

Decrease in commitment of youths appearing in Superior Court to correctional schools, hospitals, state farms, prisons and private institutions. Fifty-three were committed in 1966, 30 in 1970 and 26 during last year.

A slight decrease in the number of youths returned to correctional institutions. Ten were returned in 1966, 11 in 1970 and eight in 1971.

A 5 per cent decrease in male juvenile referrals during 1971 over the previous year, while the number of female referrals increased 5 per cent in 1971 over 1970.

A total of 72 juveniles placed in the foster-home or intensive probation programs.

SENATOR HAYDEN

Mr. PELL. I deeply regret the death of our former colleague, Carl Hayden.

I well remember when I first came to the Senate the kindness and wisdom of Senator Hayden. He gave me good advice and guided my early steps in this body. I think part of the reason for his kindness to me was because he served with my father in the other body where they had known each other and had been friends. If ever there was a Senator who followed his own adage of being a workhorse, and not a showhorse, it was Senator Hayden. I know that my admiration and affection for him was shared by all who came in contact with this fine old pioneer.

To his nephews and family, I extend my deepest sense of loss.

A MAN FROM ALASKA

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I would like to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article that appeared in the January 1972, issue of American Forests at page 26. This was entitled "A Man From Alaska" by James B. Craig. It concerned Mr. Burton W. Silcock, the present Director of the Bureau of Land Management. As some of my colleagues undoubtedly are aware, Mr. Silcock brought with him, when he was appointed Director of the Bureau of Land Management, a vast experience in Alaska and particularly a considerable amount of expertise in the 49th State. His record in combating innumerable forest fires was most commendable. The acreage loss dropped considerably as his innovations and improved techniques were utilized to hold down the rampant destruction caused by massive forest fires.

As the article points out, Mr. Silcock was a pioneer in organizing the Helitack instant attack system. This was but one of his contributions to the preservation of our national lands in Alaska.

I am sure that Mr. Silcock will be equally effective in his new job.

I commend this article to my colleagues for their information.

Mr. President, I ask that the article be printed in its entirety in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A MAN FROM ALASKA

(By James B. Craig)

When Interior Secretary Morton last summer brought Burton W. Silcock to Washington and placed him in charge of the Bureau of Land Management, The American Forestry Association had more than ordinary interest in the event.

Forest protection is the number one plank in AFA's Program for American Forestry. When catastrophic fires swept Alaska in 1969, some man-caused as well as lightning strikes, the Association went to work to help strengthen BLM's fire-fighting apparatus in the State. The man who headed this effort was Silcock, for six years Alaska Director of BLM.

In 1969 fire losses in Alaska were appalling. A 14-year record of an average 923,078 acres a year was bad enough but in 1969 a total of 4,231,830 acres were consumed. Something definitely had to be done and something was done. While the number of fires did not decrease appreciably (511 in 1969, 504 in 1970) the acreage loss in 1970 was held to 118,237. While fire danger was not so serious in 1970, once explosive early season conditions let up due to rain, this was, nevertheless, a marked improvement and credit must be given to Mr. Silcock.

In 1969 when some fires burned for weeks at a time, AFA believed the principal thrust of a stepped-up control effort should be a strong air arm plus use of retardants and smoke-jumpers in a fire jurisdiction that extends 800 miles in one direction. The idea was to hit little fires quickly before they became big fires. This idea of instant attack, previously unknown in Alaska, proved to be part of the answer but a tactical air arm was not the whole answer by any means.

In a recent interview, Silcock conceded there is great tactical advantage in having a strong air arm in achieving early attack but he further indicated that air power will never supplant the Queen of Battles—well-trained fire-fighting infantry on the ground when it comes to winning Alaska's major fire engagements.

When fires are breaking out all over a big state, and spreading, a Fire Boss tends to run out of smoke-jumpers and airplanes and helicopters, Silcock said. Also it requires several days to drop a jumper, retrieve him, and get him started on a new assignment. While mobility is vital in winning the skirmishes, so is a well-trained army in winning the big engagements, Silcock said. As the forester described it, one visualized air power in Alaska fire fighting as being akin to Stonewall Jackson's cavalry in the Civil War—fast moving and fast striking. But Lee was always just behind with his main body of Virginians and other troops.

At any rate, Silcock, as field general of Alaska's fire-fighting forces, decided he needed more and better infantry as well as stronger and faster air attack. To get them, he sent his professional firemen into villages and hamlets all over Alaska to train native villagers to fight fires. He saw these people as a corps of satellite striking forces all over the state but concentrated on 12 special bases, always ready for immediate callup.

This effort has been successful, he thinks. More than 1,000 natives have been trained so far to serve as standby fire fighters. They are tough, know the country, and show keen interests in their work. That they are now recognized as a superb striking force was recognized in the lower Forty-Eight when 800 of them were imported to fight a forest fire in the Pacific Northwest.

In organizing the so-called Helitack instant attack system, Silcock and his general staff saw three key thrusts: 1) improved communications; 2) standby crews of trained men; and 3) selection and placement of equipment, operators and supplies in the State's forested areas.

Silcock expressed some satisfaction with his improved communications network. Facilities in vehicles and in the towns and villages have been improved. Of substantial aid has been a series of "repeaters" placed strategically on mountaintops that are triggered by two high frequency FM channels at lower elevations, the batteries of which units are recharged by the sun. This has enabled the communications network to overcome the previous hurdle posed by the Alaska range.

While more vehicles and other fire-fighting materials are needed, the previous gap has been bridged to a degree with the result that more hardware is immediately available on short notice. The strategically-located fire-fighting infantry can be moved by marching, truck or helicopter as required.

"Right now, the attack pattern consists of air-flown retardants and jumpers to hit the small fires with the native villagers ready to move in if the skirmish becomes a battle," Silcock said. "But if fires are too close to centers of population or on extremely valuable land all the attack forces may converge at once."

When AMERICAN FORESTS asked him if he now had enough money, material and people to cope with Alaska fire emergencies, Silcock was guardedly optimistic.

"I think we are advancing about as fast as we can within the present limits of our own capabilities," he replied. "We do need more trained, permanent people up there and we need to fill out our equipment needs, more tankers, for example."

Money presently is available in a pinch, he said. Regular fire appropriations inadequate for a major rash of fires can be filled out by supplemental appropriations. That would indicate the 1270 Regular Fire Appropriation for the state should be given more muscle. While some gaps exist, Silcock couldn't say enough for his own BLM fire personnel in Alaska and his native "army." They are superb, he said.

Born in 1922 in Burley, Idaho, Silcock, is a big, rangy man who earned three varsity letters at Utah State University in Logan, Utah, where he majored in range management. His first full-time federal position was in Texas in 1947 as a range conservationist with the Soil Conservation Service. He joined BLM in 1948 as a member of a field party in the Big Horn Basin of Wyoming. Since that time he has held a number of key posts in BLM and much of his work was concentrated on range management. He saw service in World War II.

Still feeling his way in his new post, he was reluctant to express views on some measures now pending in Congress including the Alaska native claims. But he has very definite views on BLM immediate and long-range basic goals.

First, BLM needs a new Charter in the form of an Organic Act that will enable the bureau to really practice multiple use management on its lands, he believes. He believes that the time for this action is now.

"The Public Lands are just being discovered," he said. "The horizons are very broad and our managers need new breathing room," he said. The implementation of the proposals of the Public Land Law Review Commission and other bills before Congress all point in the right direction, he feels. A new, modern look is a real necessity.

"Secondly, we've got to have planning," he said. "There is no more new land. We've reached both the Pacific and the Arctic."

This means that managers must become more people-oriented and that plans for land must be made before irreparable damage is done to both the land and the people on it.

BLM's so-called Multiple Use Bill expired in 1964. But Silcock points to the great progress that was made by BLM up to that time in Alaska alone. Complete land classification was carried out on the six million acres around Iliamna Lake and 22 million acres in the Copper River Basin. Unfortunately, similar programs in the White Mountains and Brooks Range areas were not completed prior to the expiration. Even so, a total of 70 million BLM acres in Alaska were classified for future use.

The need for planning for many areas, especially in Alaska, is due to the very fragility of some of the resources, he said. As regards people, he said he is always conscious of "vacant chairs" whenever he sits down to discuss needs and issues with any single type of resource user. If one does this any other way, he works with "blindness," Silcock said.

"There are always other people present whether they are physically there or not," he stressed. The public lands, he added, are going to be used "heavily" for practically every form of recreation activity.

What are his views on the proposed Alaska pipeline? "My hope is that if it's done, it's done right," he said. "And it's our job to see that it is done right if that is the decision." But if the pipeline is built, it should be above the ground and the needs of the fragile land and the wildlife thereon should be fully considered, he thinks.

Pointing to the pipeline dispute, Silcock recently told a western group that "the very existence of land creates conflicts." The North Slope is no ecological desert, he said, adding that "much of the vital habitat of migratory waterfowl depends on Alaska's water and tundra."

"When oil was found on the North Slope and development started, the approach was the same as elsewhere in the past," he said. "Heretofore, thousands of miles of pipeline have been installed in various areas with only the admonition to 'bury it well, fix the fences, and close the gates.' But now the public all over the country was concerned about various developments. Oil drilling offshore, transmission line locations, a proposed power plant installation in South Carolina, methods of timber harvesting and mining, and the proposed Alaska Pipeline were all coming under active scrutiny. The pipeline in particular aroused public interest, for it is a major undertaking with some unknown impacts on the environment—primarily the permafrost. But unfortunately, overall planning on the North Slope has received little attention. The North Slope has become an area of major attention and public concern because of the times, and even more so because of the size of the proposed development." There should be more uniformity, he believes.

Silcock said he supports the Administration and Secretary Morton in the proposal to create a new Department of Natural Resources. In a modern age, government bureaus should not have different ways of doing things.

"We're dealing with the nation's resources and yet we have different procedures instead of the same procedures," he said. "I think you see a need for this sort of thing out in the field somewhat better than in Washington. In many small communities, you find two government offices managing land, sometimes the same resources, both with their own procedures, rules and ways of doing things. This is confusing."

Silcock is one professional who is not afraid of change. "I believe that change is constant" he recently told Interior's National Advisory Board Council at Boise, Idaho. "I believe it is constant even though the principles of representative government stand firm. For example, the Environmental Protection Act is now the law of the land. In applying the concepts of ecology to natural resources management programs, we are seeking a gradual and a natural evolution—always forward—never backward. To do this we must always consider the people and their needs."

"Change, or even the threat of change, brings out the self-protective reactions of people. We all dislike sudden changes that disrupt us. We who have worked with natural resources and with people all of our lives know that this is true. But this is a changing world and we must change with it. If we are to make progress, we must accept—even welcome—change."

"At times it seems that change is overrunning us. This is because the growth of our population and the growth of our technology have increased demands upon our resources many times over. To meet the challenge of change we need to quicken our reaction time and to sharpen our insights. The modern application of the concepts of Federalism requires that we make decisions as close to the land as possible and that in the very beginning we make them wisely. This is our goal."

With the nation's resource structure on the threshold of change, Silcock believes there has got to be more advance planning. Even with the best of advance planning, there still will be conflicts, he thinks. But he is equally convinced that if advance planning had been better in the past, the nation would be further ahead today in resolving conflicts, and the number of contentions would be fewer.

"Cooperative planning helps us and the public to effect change better and to accept change more readily. This lessens the impact of change," he said.

Meanwhile, Silcock is seeking advice from every strata of conservation activity and conservationists will discover that he is a good listener.

CRITICISM OF THE PRESIDENT'S VIETNAM SETTLEMENT PLAN

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, in recent days we have witnessed a well-orchestrated attack, no doubt composed and conducted by the White House, on one of the candidates for the Democratic nomination for President because he criticized President Nixon's recent proposals for a settlement in Vietnam, and offered some proposals of his own.

Of course, there is nothing really new about this attack. Those of us who have on occasion questioned the President's policies are accustomed to being accused of "jeopardizing the national interest." However, this most recent attack is notable for its harshness and the fact that it was led by the Secretary of State, who was later joined by several Republican Members of the Congress.

We have been through several so-called moratoriums on criticism of the administration, when we were told that any public voicing of differing views would be contrary to the national interest. Now, apparently the administration would like to quash any views contrary to its own, even among those who are seeking their party's nomination for the Presidency and thus have an obligation to make known their views on the most vital matters of the day.

We hear a great deal about the "national interest." If I have learned anything in recent years it is that the man in the White House thinks he is the sole arbiter of the "national interest."

I believe we ought to consider what the national interest really is. First, I am convinced that it is in the national interest for the Congress and the people to be fully informed about the foreign involvement and policies of its Government. This has not exactly been a characteristic of the present administration, nor of the preceding administration. As a corollary to having a well-informed public, I believe it is essential that those who aspire to the Presidency make every effort to make clear their views on these important questions.

I well recall that when Mr. Nixon was campaigning for the Presidency throughout the year of 1968, he consistently spoke of a "plan" for ending the war. He has had more than 3 years in office and has not ended the war.

Total American deaths in Vietnam are now about 56,000, of whom 46,000 were killed in action. About half of the American deaths have occurred since the presidential campaign of 1968. By March 1, nearly 1 million Americans will have been sent to Vietnam since President Nixon was inaugurated, and since he has come into office, 3 million tons of munitions have been dropped on Vietnam and another million on Laos and Cambodia. Therefore, I think it more than appropriate that his potential opponents make public their views on how the war can be ended. And we should be appreciative of the fact that some of the candidates are offering specific proposals, which is something Mr. Nixon should have been held to 4 years ago instead of escaping with a generality about a "plan."

I am somewhat surprised that the Secretary of State would be the leading spokesman in this attack. After all, he has been noted for his reticence to speak out publicly on foreign policy matters. When this administration has had something to say, it has usually been done in a "background briefing" by the President's assistant for national security affairs.

I also cannot help but note the strident tone of others who have joined in the Secretary of State's attack, including several members of the Senate. They have used terms like "gutter politics" and "blatant partisan purposes." Where could they possibly get the idea that there is anything political about the timing of statements and actions in regard to ending the war?

These various spokesmen for the administration resent any dissent and are apparently angered by any effort to carry out a honest and open dialog before the American people.

Let me recall the words of the President in his state of the Union address of January 20, 1972:

There are more candidates for the Presidency in this Chamber today than there probably have been at any one time in the whole history of the Republic. And there is an honest difference of opinion, not only between the parties, but within each party, on some foreign policy issues and on some domestic policy issues.

However, there are great national problems that are so vital that they transcend partisanship. So let us have our debates. Let us have our honest difference. But let us join in keeping the national interest first . . .

Mr. President, I submit that the national interest is not what one man says it is. This is not the concept on which our Constitution and our system is based. The previous administration floundered with its "politics of consensus" and its hypersensitivity to dissent. Incredibly enough, the current administration seems to be using a leftover "play book" for its "game plan."

I think Mr. Nixon was on the right track when he said, "So let us have our debates." But we cannot have a debate if only one voice is heard, if only one alternative is offered the American people, and if the executive branch and its supporters gang up to gag and impugn anyone who questions what the true national interest might be.

CARL HAYDEN

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I would like to pay tribute to a great American, a man whose memory will be cherished by the people of this Nation for many years to come.

Senator Carl Hayden devoted his life to his country. No man ever served his State and our Nation in the Congress for a longer period of time. He entered the House of Representatives in 1912, the year Arizona joined the Union as the 48th State. When he moved to the Senate in 1927, he continued to serve with distinction and dedication until his retirement 2 years ago.

Senator Hayden was a pioneer in the development of the great resource projects. It was his contribution to the establishment of dams that provided water and power to the South and Southwest, thus aiding in the growth and development of America.

Mr. President, at this point I would like to quote the late Senator Richard Russell which, I feel, capture the essence of this great American:

I can say without fear of successful contradiction that he has never failed to fight the good fight for the things in which he believes. Never at any time has this man departed from his honest opinions under pressure from any source.

No man has ever served as long in the Congress of the United States. He has been here for 56 years and under 10 Presidents. He has an unusual characteristic that enables him to complete this service—this unparalleled service—without ever having made an enemy or ever having had his motives questioned at any time. I cannot conceive of any finer or higher tribute to any man.

He was impartial in dealing with people whether he agreed with them or not and he always reflected an integrity which was transparent. He has a personality that not only commands the respect of all who know him but we have many men with secure places in history who value or have valued his friendship among their most treasured possessions.

Vast areas of new opportunities have been opened for countless Americans as a result of the vision and energy of Senator Hayden. Today, industry and commerce thrive on once barren landscapes, and vineyards and gardens bear bountifully on what was sterile land when this man came to the Congress.

Mr. President, it was my privilege to serve with Carl Hayden for over 20 years. His record of accomplishment is an impressive one; he will be long remembered by both his colleagues and this Nation.

I join with the other Members of this body in mourning the passing of this great American.

QUORUM CALL

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TUNNEY). Is there further morning business?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TUNNEY). Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is concluded.

FOREIGN ASSISTANCE AND RELATED PROGRAMS APPROPRIATIONS, 1972

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TUNNEY). Under the previous order, the Chair now lays before the Senate H.R. 12067, which the clerk will state.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

H.R. 12067, making appropriations for foreign assistance and related programs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1972, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Illinois (Mr. STEVENSON), amendment No. 865, on which there is a time limitation of 20 minutes, with 10 minutes to each side.

STATUS OF PENDING BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute on the bill, on behalf of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE), to ask unanimous consent that H.R. 12067 remain the pending business until disposed of or until 2:30 p.m. today, whichever is the earlier.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS SUBJECT TO THE CALL OF THE CHAIR

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that time may be equally charged against both sides on the bill with respect to a recess on which I am about to make a motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess, subject to the call of the Chair, with the understanding that the recess not extend beyond 12 noon today.

The motion was agreed to; and at 11:05 a.m. the Senate took a recess, subject to the call of the Chair.

The Senate reassembled at 12 noon when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. STEVENSON).

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States, submitting nominations, were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Leonard, one of his secretaries.

PLANS FOR BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BENTSEN) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

To the Congress of the United States:

"Seafaring is necessary," says the Latin inscription on an old building in one of the great European port cities; "mere living is not." This same spirit of movement, venture, and quest animates the whole sweep of America's story—from its discovery by men who lived for sailing, to its founding as a nation by men who lived for liberty, to its modern maturity as the world's preeminent power—and it will do so still, 4 years hence, when we observe the Bicentennial of American Independence. The Nation could not if it wanted to, and should not if it could, drop anchor somewhere in 1976 and savor the occasion at leisure. By its very nature it can only speed through the year as through any other, under full sail, on into a new century.

The central challenge of our Bicentennial preparations, therefore, is to plan for an observance "on the move." Many groups—public and private, national and local—have already devoted several years of creative thought and effort to meeting this challenge. The common goal to which all subscribe has nowhere been stated better than in the 1970 report of the celebration's official planning and coordinating body, the American Revolution Bicentennial Commission (ARBC): "to forge a new national commitment—a new spirit for '76—a commitment which will unite the nation in purpose and dedication to the advancement of human welfare as we move into Century III of American National Life."

We can best forge such a spirit, the Commission went on to recommend, by approaching the Bicentennial as an occasion both for understanding our heritage better and for quickening the progress toward our horizons—not just in one chosen location or a few, but in every State, city, and community. The Commission's goal and the principles deriving from it have my strongest support, and I have followed with interest the ARBC's further work as well as that of the individual Bicentennial Commissions already set up or now being formed by each State and territory, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia.

THE BICENTENNIAL IN WASHINGTON

Since the Federal Government has special responsibility for District of Columbia affairs, my closest contact has been with the planning effort now underway here in the District—and I have found its progress thus far most impressive. And so it should be. For while no one city will dominate this truly national anniversary, Washington—which was built to be the Capital of the Republic born in 1776 and seat of the Government constituted in 1787, and which has been in many ways a center of the hopes of all Americans in all generations since—has a unique role to play. As its plans are made known, they may well serve as a stimulus and an example for the equally important plans being made in thousands of other communities. Both to ensure that Washington itself is ready for 1976 and to spur Bicentennial activity all across the country, I shall outline to the Congress today an action plan for Federal partnership in the District of Columbia's Bicentennial observance.

My proposals follow two basic themes. One is the quest for quality of life—today's name for the age-old aspiration which Jefferson at the Nation's birth called "the pursuit of happiness." Here is the very essence of a Bicentennial celebrated "on the move." The past success of this quest, its present vigor, and its future prospects will provide a telling measure for our self-assessment as the great milestone nears. Such a theme's immediacy will call up exertion as well as congratulation—not only a birthday party but an actual rebirth.

The second theme which I would stress is dual excellence for Washington. In choosing which Bicentennial projects to pursue among myriad worthy possibilities, an old question arises again and again: Washington for Washingtonians, or Washington for all Americans? A kind of civic schizophrenia has troubled this city from the earliest days of its double existence as both a national capital and a community in its own right. Solutions going to both extremes have had their advocates—yet there is a better answer than either making thousands of people reside neglected in a strictly Federal city that is "a nice place to visit," or making millions of other people receive their governance from a narrowly provincial and self-centered capital where officials and visitors are classed as outsiders.

The Bicentennial Era, I am convinced, is the right time for Washington to gain a new and more expansive sense of itself.

and to find in its dual identity an opportunity for dual excellence unparalleled among American cities. The seat of government can excel as an exemplary living city, at the same time the home of 750,000 local residents excels as a gracious host to fellow citizens and foreign visitors who may number 40 million during 1976 alone.

The projects proposed in this message, then, treat quality of life in the Nation's Capital as indivisible. They aim for dual excellence, in the conviction that a more livable city is a more visitable one, and vice versa. For the most part, they emphasize physical construction—not by any means because public works are the sum total of our Bicentennial intentions for the District, but only because building time is already becoming critically short. Activities of many other types, such as commemorative events, pageantry, and social and cultural programs, which will of course be essential to the human dimension of the Bicentennial but which require somewhat shorter lead-times, are also being planned. Reports on these activities and, in many cases, requests for approval and funding will be submitted to the Congress as we move toward 1976.

One further note on Bicentennial concerns not mentioned here but certainly not forgotten: It is my feeling that nothing we could do for the District of Columbia during the next 4 years would be more meaningful or more appropriate to the Spirit of '76 than granting this city and its people first-class status: voting representation in the Congress. I am encouraged by the apparently warmer climate for this reform on Capitol Hill in 1972, and it will continue to have my support.

PORT LINCOLN NEW TOWN

Speaking at the National Archives last summer in a ceremony inaugurating the Bicentennial Era, I described an unusual painting which hangs in the Roosevelt Room across from the Oval Office in the White House. The scene portrayed is the signing of the Declaration of Independence—but for some reason the canvas was never finished, and many of the figures in the crowded hall are just sketched in, or left blank. The symbolism of this, I said, is that "the American Revolution is unfinished business, with important roles still open for each of us to play." A broad cross-section of District of Columbia citizens have now begun playing their roles in the continuing drama by serving on Mayor Washington's recently formed Bicentennial Assembly and Bicentennial Commission. We in the administration found the work of the old local Commission quite valuable in formulating our own plans for 1976, and we look forward to working closely with the reorganized, two-level planning group in the future.

One of the strongest strains of community opinion identified by local representatives like these is a commitment to revitalizing the urban heart of this Washington area. This, not flight to the suburbs or complacent satisfaction with the status quo, seems to arouse hope and determination at the neighborhood level. At the same time it seems a most appropriate cornerstone for a Bicentennial program designed to lift the quality of Washington life.

Accordingly, I shall initiate immediate Federal action to move ahead on plans for building a new town at Fort Lincoln in Northeast Washington. Fort Lincoln, over 300 acres of open land which received its name as a military post a century ago and which was long the site of the National Training School for Boys, offers an ideal chance to create not just another urban project where homes are razed and the human factor is designed out, but a totally new community planned around people. More than 4,000 dwellings for families of varied incomes are envisioned—three-quarters of them owner-occupied, to provide an anchor of stability in the development.

Innovative public transportation and communications systems and experimental educational programs would help knit the community together. Both the installation of these features and the construction work itself would be used as demonstration settings for some of the social-benefit technology applications which I proposed in my State of the Union message. Also integral to the new town would be a Federal employment center for 5,000 to 10,000 employees, and a possible satellite campus for the Federal City College. The development would be financed through public-private partnership, with the initial Federal investment (supplemented by District contributions which will need approval by the Congress) likely to be matched several times over in related private investment.

"The city lives!"—a rallying cry which meets with considerable skepticism in some quarters today—would be the assurance forcefully offered to Washingtonians and the world by a Fort Lincoln town occupied and operating in 1976. We are determined to make it happen.

NEIGHBORHOOD SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

The Fort Lincoln idea is not new, but the impetus behind it is—a neighborhood, community-based impetus, with which I am delighted to associate this administration. In order to demonstrate our support for this kind of bootstrap Bicentennial initiative, we shall ask the Congress to make available several million dollars in Federal funds to supplement the local funds set aside to carry out the social development project proposals which will be gathered by the local Bicentennial Commission and Assembly in neighborhoods all over Washington beginning this spring. None of these latter projects will approach the scale of Fort Lincoln, but most will be no less soundly rooted in ordinary people's knowledge of their own needs. The process of listening and response, as well as the project implementation itself, will make for a healthier and more progressive city.

We are also increasing our efforts to assist in redevelopment of the inner-city areas devastated by the riots of April 1968. Two recent ground-breakings give evidence that the work is moving ahead, but also remind us of how much is left to do. The job, of course, is not the Federal Government's alone, but we must and shall contribute our full share and see the obligation through at an accelerated pace.

MORE COMMUNITY PARKS

One frequently voiced need is for more parkland—not just in the ceremonial center of the city, but out in the residential sections as well. Planning is now underway for a joint Federal-District park development program focusing on underused, publicly owned land near the Anacostia River, close to some of the District's most crowded neighborhoods. New recreational facilities will be constructed, to permit intensive use of the sorely needed new parks by Anacostia residents. Also within the Anacostia Basin, improvements will be carried out at the National Arboretum. Another major green-space project planned for completion by 1976 is the Fort Circle Parks, 17 outposts of the Army's old defensive system around the periphery of the District of Columbia, some dating back as far as the War of 1812. Strips of parkland are to link all the forts into a continuous belt containing bike trails, hiking paths, community recreation facilities, and campsites. Further, the District and the Interior Department will cooperate in rehabilitating and upgrading smaller parks in many areas of the city. I ask the Congress to approve the funds requested in my 1973 budget to move all of these projects forward on schedule.

A NEW DOWNTOWN CENTER

I also support, as vital to the kind of development momentum Washington must have to hold its head up among American cities in the Bicentennial Era, the District government's intention to construct a major convention center-sports arena complex near Mount Vernon Square.

This project would help to counter the centrifugal forces which are pushing both the leisure activities of local people and the major gatherings of out-of-town visitors away from the centers of many major cities. It would mean new business and investments and jobs for blocks around. And it would inject new life into nearby neighborhoods—provided, of course, that the legitimate concerns of merchants, working people, and residents in those neighborhoods receive fair consideration in the planning and location process. The scope of Federal assistance, however, should be appropriately limited, since I believe that a development largely local in function and benefits should have substantial local financing as well.

FOLLOWING THROUGH: EDUCATION AND TRANSPORTATION

New communities, new parks, new focal points for downtown business—all will help Washington carry through the ARBC's "Horizons '76" theme of honoring our founding principles by forging a better future with them. So too will two other ongoing District efforts, for which congressional assistance requested during the last session is still much needed: our public colleges and our Metro subway system.

Washington Technical Institute is proceeding with plans for buildings at its new permanent location on the north side of the former Bureau of Standards site in Northwest Washington. Federal City College remains in scattered lease space throughout the city despite explosive enrollment growth in the past 4 years; it hopes to occupy a campus of its own in and around the old District Library building north of Mount Vernon Square, as well as satellite locations elsewhere. The Congress can help to expedite these campus development efforts by enacting the D.C. Capital Financing Act, which makes special provision for funding college construction through direct Federal grants rather than through Treasury loans as at present.

In my D.C. message urging this action last April, I noted that WTI and the new International Center which is to share the Bureau of Standards site will in the future symbolize "side by side the Capital City's dedication to human development and to international understanding." Action by the Congress late in 1971 cleared the way for actual sale to foreign governments of lots at the International Center to begin last week. By 1976 the cluster of new chanceries there will be a pride to Americans and foreign guests alike. Let us now make sure that the District's public colleges will also be a showplace in the Bicentennial year. Ample and balanced opportunities in higher education are essential, if we are to convince millions of 1976 student visitors that the District takes care of its own.

Metro, and all of the other elements which with it will comprise a balanced modern transportation system for greater Washington, are central to Bicentennial plans for the District. We need the pride of achievement in areawide cooperation which the system will give all communities taking part. We need its people-moving capacity to cope with visitor traffic which may average up to 100,000 people daily throughout the anniversary year. I am today renewing the commitment of all the agencies and resources of the Federal Government toward maximum progress on the entire transportation system—subway, freeways, bridges, parking, and support facilities—before 1976. The action of the Congress in December to support continued Metro funding was enormously heartening to the people of the Capital region; it gave, in fact, a glimmer of hope to beleaguered commuters everywhere. The grim Thanksgiving prospect of a great many excavated streets to fill back in has now become the far brighter prospect of at least 24 miles of operating subway—the most modern anywhere—by 1976. Urgently needed now is prompt approval by the Congress of Federal guarantees for Metro revenue bonds—the next essential step to getting the trains running.

TO WELCOME 40 MILLION GUESTS

Both the sheer visitor volume anticipated at the height of the bicentennial observance, and the important goal of eliminating a "them and us" polarity between city residents and their guests from around the world, dictate that past patterns which have made the Mall and its immediate environs a sort of "tourist ghetto" must now go. All of Washington must be made not only hospitable and attractive to the visitor—which the proposals just outlined should go far toward achieving—but easily accessible as well. I have directed the Secretary of Transportation to coordinate interagency ac- tion plans for supplementing those subway lines in service by 1976 with a coordinated network of other public transportation on which visitors can move from fringe parking areas (to be developed under these plans) to points of interest nearer the city center.

At the hub of this network should be a new National Visitors Center in and around Union Station. Such a facility, desirable for all years, becomes indispensable as we look to the Bicentennial. I have therefore charged the Secretary of the Interior, in consultation with the Secretary of Transportation, to take immediate action to move the National Visitors Center out of the talk stage, and to prepare new proposals for bringing it to completion by 1976. When Union Station was built early in this century at the height of the railroad era, one of its express purposes was to permit removal of an unsightly terminal and tracks from the east end of the Mall. Its rehabilitation in the seventies as the Capital's principal reception and orientation point for travelers on all modes of ground transportation would be most appropriate, and would once again relieve the Mall and downtown areas of much traffic congestion. An "air rights" parking garage for buses and visitors' cars, convenient public transit connections, and a central information facility tied in with a citywide tourist guidance and information system would be the major features of the project.

Here is an opportunity for public and private resources to combine to fill a Bicentennial need. Notwithstanding the collapse of previous railroad financing plans for the Center at the time of the Penn Central bankruptcy, I have asked Secretaries Morton and Volpe to seek substantial railroad participation as they formulate the new proposals. I shall submit these to the Congress as soon as possible, with hopes of rapid approval.

Another step which should promote smoother tourist flow to major attractions is construction of a Metro station at Arlington National Cemetery. This station, for which planning funds are requested in my new budget, would speed movement from Washington over to the Arlington shrine, which by 1976 will be enhanced with numerous improvements including a new Memorial Chapel and columbarium. At the same time it would offer the arriving visitor one more convenient transfer point from private to public transportation on the way into the Capital itself.

BICENTENNIAL GARDENS

Moving in toward the center of the city, what will the 1976 visitor find along the Mall? Most strikingly new and charming, perhaps, would be a park and recreation center called Bicentennial Gardens, which I propose be developed in the open land along Constitution Avenue between the Washington Monument and Lincoln Memorial. Since the last of the old World War I "tempos" were removed from the West Mall in 1970, we have explored many alternative plans for developing in their place facilities for people of all ages, incomes, and interests, residents and tourists alike, to enjoy.

The Bicentennial Gardens plan, which will soon be ready to present in detail but which of course remains open to the ideas and desires of those for whom it is intended, might be called an American cousin of Copenhagen's beloved Tivoli. It follows the present contours of the land on a low profile in keeping with other Mall developments. A restaurant, smaller eating areas, an open-air theater, a bandshell, an area for ice skating, a children's play area, fountains, gardens, a boating lake, and walking paths are examples of the kind of features that might be included. There could be underground parking to accommodate tour buses, a terminal for the tourist trams, and a visitors center in the middle of the Gardens. With such a development, the Mall's attractions would be better balanced and dispersed, evening activities now concentrated in the Smithsonian Quadrangle would have a second focal point, and mingling of Washingtonians and visitors in a pleasant year-round setting would be encouraged. Quality of life for everyone in the Capital would be enhanced.

THE MALL IN 1976

The three major monuments and memorials in easy reach of Bicentennial Gardens are to be renovated and improved in a 4-year Park Service program beginning with this year's budget now before the Congress. Another facelifting project along the whole length of the Mall, and on the Ellipse as well, will reconstruct roadways, add walks, bikeways, plantings, and fountains, and provide for a new Ceremonial Drive. This work too is budgeted for fiscal year 1973 and beyond, to be completed by 1976.

The Mall east of the Washington Monument should also have a new look for the Bicentennial. Besides the Hirshhorn Museum and National Gallery of Art addition which are now being constructed, there will be a handsome new building for one of the Mall's oldest tenants, the Smithsonian Institution. This structure, which will house the National Air and Space Museum with exhibits ranging from Kitty Hawk to Hadley Rille and with a former astronaut in charge, can be ready in 1976 if the Congress will move now to approve FY 1973 construction funds for it; the plans are nearly complete. The Smithsonian also plans restoration of the historic Arts and Industries Building to its original 1880s appearance, as a fit setting for the Nation's Centennial exhibits which it displayed following the Philadelphia Exposition nearly a century ago and will display again for the Bicentennial, and construction of a major new "Nation of Nations" exhibit in the Museum of History and Technology to illustrate America's multi-cultural tradition. Both projects are the subject of FY 1973 budget requests.

A fourth important undertaking by the Smithsonian—not on the Mall but rather a part of the effort to give the bicentennial activities metropolitan scope—is the Bicentennial Outdoor Museum planned for old Fort Foote, Maryland, on the Potomac in Prince Georges County. The restored fort is to serve as the scene for re-creation of Revolutionary events such as encampments, war-time life, and parades for 1976. I ask prompt congressional action on legislation to approve the Bicentennial Outdoor Museum and to authorize appropriations for planning it.

REALIZING A VISION: PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE

As L'Enfant's majestic expanse of Mall provides an axis along which Washington visitors can honor and relive the American past, so Pennsylvania Avenue, leaving the Mall by the new reflecting pool in front of the Capitol and angling away from it a long mile up to the White House, forms the main axis of government activity shaping the American present and future. This avenue, then, also demands attention as we move to dress up the heart of the city for our two hundredth birthday. By 1976, let us complete the great Federal Triangle office complex in the spirit of the McMillan Commission's original vision 70 years ago. Let us build at its center a Grand Plaza worthy of the name, by transforming what is now a parking lot into a people-oriented park for government workers and visitors to enjoy. (Visitors will also benefit from the new information and orientation center to be opened in the Great Hall of the Commerce Building by 1976, intended to introduce citizens to the activities of all the executive departments and agencies.) I have requested funds in my budget for fiscal year 1973 to move forward on the Federal Triangle and Grand Plaza projects; with the cooperation of the Congress the work will begin in the near future.

The north side of Pennsylvania Avenue, and with it many blocks of the downtown area, can also be revitalized or well on the way by the time we celebrate the Bicentennial. The FBI building now rising north of the Avenue symbolizes half of the answer—Federal construction—and can stand completed and in use by 1976 with continued congressional support. A further appropriation for this project is included in my new budget requests.

The other half of the answer for Pennsylvania Avenue is coordinated development planning which will mobilize the private sector and help bring commercial and residential activity back to this part of the city. The heart of Washington must not become so dominated by Federal buildings that it sits abandoned and lifeless on evenings and weekends. The two Presidents before me initiated steps to prevent this, and to make the Avenue instead a corridor of lively and varied activity, public and private—and my administration has continued to press this effort. In September 1970 I announced my strong support for a legislative proposal to establish a development corporation to accomplish the needed revitalization. Since then the proposal has been substantially modified in a good faith effort to accommodate all interests and segments of opinion. Once again, I urge the Congress to act quickly and favorably on the Pennsylvania Avenue Bicentennial Development Corporation bill.

When I first expressed support for the corporation plan nearly 17 months ago, I called it "an opportunity to fulfill, in this city, at this time, a magnificent vision of the men who founded our Nation, and at the same time to create a standard for the rest of the Nation by which to measure their own urban achievement, and on which to build visions of their own." It is not an opportunity that waits forever, though; of the time available between that 1970 statement and the beginning of the Bicentennial year, more than a fourth is already gone. Every month that passes without this legislation further dims our chances of giving all Americans one birthday present they ought to have—a Capital "main street" to be proud of.

THE NEXT FOUR YEARS

Both local and Federal plans for the Bicentennial celebration here in the Nation's Capital are far from complete at present. It is right that they should continue to evolve and expand as we move toward 1976. This message, however, attempts to set the tone and theme for Federal participation over the course of the next 4 years, and also to convey some of the aspirations of Washingtonians themselves without presuming to dictate what those aspirations should be.

The various levels and jurisdictions of government in the Washington area are well organized to follow through on the proposals I make today and to supervise further planning. The American Revolution Bicentennial Commission, with its distinguished bipartisan membership headed by David J. Mahoney, continues to provide excellent national leadership. The District government is well served by the responsive local Assembly and Commission structure to which I referred above; Mayor Washington is also establishing liaison with suburban planning bodies and with State officials of both Virginia and Maryland. The massive and diverse physical construction effort outlined in this message has been coordinated through a full-time District of Columbia bicentennial task force within the General Services Administration, until recently headed with great skill by Administrator Robert Kunzig. Now that Mr. Kunzig has become a Federal judge, I shall ensure that this coordination work is carried forward at the same high standard.

Under such direction and with the support of the Congress, we can achieve our Bicentennial goal of dual excellence in the District of Columbia, and we can realize by 1976 a dramatic improvement in the quality of Washington life for all whose physical or spiritual home this great Capital is. And by so doing we can help to inspire and encourage the preparations of other communities all across the country for a truly magnificent Bicentennial.

RICHARD NIXON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 4, 1972.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Presiding Officer (Mr. BENTSEN) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of Senate proceedings.)

ORDER FOR FURTHER TRANSACTIONS OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to the consideration of routine morning business with statements therein limited to 3 minutes, for a period not to exceed 6 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from California (Mr. TUNNEY) is recognized for 3 minutes.

EMERGENCY UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

Mr. TUNNEY. Mr. President, contained in the appropriations bill we are debating today are desperately needed funds for the unemployment trust fund to carry out the Emergency Unemployment Compensation Act. This act signed into law just 4 weeks ago to provide emergency relief to hundreds of thousands of jobless persons in States with severe unemployment.

The act provides an additional 13 weeks of emergency unemployment compensation for workers who have exhausted all regular and extended benefits. These benefits are available in States where the unemployment rate, counting both insured unemployed and those who have exhausted unemployment insurance, exceeds 6.5 percent.

Mr. President. This new emergency program took effect 3 days ago on January 31, 1972. At the present time, 14 States—Alaska, California, Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont, Washington, and Puerto Rico—have unemployment rates exceeding the 6.5 percent trigger. Thus, jobless persons in those States who have exhausted all benefits are now eligible for emergency aid to reduce the terrible hardships they suffer. These are people who have been out of work for over 10 months—many of them for a year or even more. In California alone there are over 300,000 persons who fall in this category.

Mr. President, virtually all of the States eligible for this new program have begun to implement it immediately by using their own funds to pay these benefits until Congress acts to appropriate the money to reimburse them as provided in the new law. The President has requested funds in his budget message for payment of these benefits but until we appropriate the funds, the States are forced to advance their own money.

Through the efforts of Senator MAGNUSON and others among us, the Appropriations Committee has agreed to speed up funds for these emergency benefits by including an appropriation in the bill before us. This action will assure that no delays occur in relieving the severe hardship of the many thousands of people who have exhausted all other sources of aid. And it will prevent them from being reduced to the terrible indignity of welfare. I therefore urge the Senate to enact this measure as quickly as possible and I urge the Senate conferees to keep the grave urgency of these funds before them as they meet in conference with the House.

Mr. President, the need, unfortunately, is especially critical in California because the Reagan administration is refusing to pay these desperately needed emergency benefits until Federal money is actually delivered. Such callous disregard for the hardship of thousands of jobless persons is inconceivable to me, but nevertheless, it is the reality which exists in California. This kind of hard-hearted pennypinching may be understandable from one who pays no State income taxes, but I do not think the Congress should allow it to happen.

By passing this bill today we can help prevent a needless hardship to 300,000 people in my State alone. In addition, we can relieve from all of the eligible States the burden of carrying this program on their own resources until we act on a supplemental bill in March. I urge that we do so immediately and I ask my colleagues in the Senate to join me in appealing to the House of Representatives to accept this very humanitarian amendment in conference.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that morning business again be closed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FOREIGN ASSISTANCE AND RELATED PROGRAMS APPROPRIATIONS, 1972

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12067) making appropriations for foreign assistance and related programs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1972, and for other purposes.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent that the time for the quorum be charged equally against both sides on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BENTSEN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment (No. 865) of the Senator from Illinois (Mr. STEVENSON). Who yields time?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may require.

The amendment restores $50 million to the appropriation for the relief of refugees in East Pakistan. The authorizing legislation in both the Senate and the House has provided $250 million in assistance for the refugees. That same amount was requested by the President in his budget. The appropriation bill so far provides only $175 million. In other words, the amount authorized has been reduced by $75 million.

As I understand it, the reason for the cut is an assumption that adequate food is available in Bangladesh for the people of that nation, and that a $175 million contribution by the United States is a fair share of what it is assumed will be a multinational contribution of about $650 million.

In turn, I will explain the reasons for my amendment. Only now are the full dimensions of the relief needs in Bangladesh emerging. Only now, and somewhat dimly, are the horrors, of the recent past and the consequences of those horrors, becoming evident. Food is available in Bangladesh both from external and internal sources. But that is not the most serious difficulty facing the people of the new nation. The difficulty is that neither food nor other commodities can be distributed because the transportation system, never adequate, is now in shambles. Barges are needed, trucks are needed, bridges are needed, as well as food, medicine, and clothing. Shelter is needed and must be supplied. The transportation system must be repaired before the monsoons begin in late April.

The dimensions of the need far exceed the $650 million international effort assumed in this appropriation and upon which the $175 million is figured. The need is now, if it is not already too late, to help the millions of innocent victims of the atrocities in Bangladesh.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield.

Mr. FONG. Would the Senator from Illinois accept an amendment to his amendment to raise the amount from $225 million to $250 million?

Mr. STEVENSON. I certainly would accept such an amendment. In fact, I had very much hoped, at the outset, to submit an amendment in a form which would release the full amount, which would make available $250 million, itself an amount completely inadequate for the needs of the people in Bangladesh. I would welcome such an amendment as the Senator from Hawaii proposes and be grateful for it.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I offer that amendment.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the yeas and nays have not been ordered. I think the Senator from Illinois can modify his amendment to make the amount $250 million.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois so modify his amendment, or is he asking that a modification be offered?

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask that the amendment be so modified.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be a cosponsor of the modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has a right to modify his amendment, and the Senator from Hawaii is added as a cosponsor.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I have spoken with the Senator from Illinois about this amendment. First, I wish to explain to the Senate why the committee did not provide the $250 million to begin with.

We recognize that this is one of the saddest—probably the most tragic—human catastrophes, in modern times. More people are suffering, dying, and starving to death in this part of the world than at any other time, probably, in human history.

These citizens of Bangladesh are a people who have suffered what I think ought to be categorized as genocide. They have no property and no food. They were desperate before; now they are literally dying of great need.

The United States is, of course, in dire financial straits. We discussed that in some detail yesterday. I am very reluctant to approve any increase in the bill. But in spite of that, under these tragic circumstances we should be able to allow $250 million or perhaps even more. We simply felt that there had not been adequate detailing of how much money could be spent in the immediate future or the exact purpose for which it would be spent. This is particularly true considering the enormous amount of Indian rupees in counterpart funds that might be used.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Would the Senator from Wisconsin advise the Chair on whose time he is speaking?

Mr. PROXMIRE. On the time in opposition to the amendment.

For this reason, because this proposal is something that does seem to require clarification, we felt that the sound and sensible approach was to provide $175 million, and then, as the year went on, to provide additional funds if the administration could make a case that more was needed.

However, the Senator from Illinois has made a direct, personal survey of the situation and has provided some information I did not know of before. I do not think that I or many other Senators ever knew about the desperate need for dollars. The money will be made available until expended, so it is not something that has to be expended rapidly over 4 months.

Under the circumstances, I am happy to join the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. FONG) in supporting the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. I think it is not only the humane thing to do, but the right and moral thing to do. We would not put any kind of dollar sign at all on human suffering and human life. This is the kind of investment that ought to be made in foreign aid.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

We in the committee felt that $175 million was not enough, but we were waiting for the supplemental bill to come up so we could add to it. Since the distinguished Senator from Illinois has asked for the $250 million, I am very happy to go along with it.

It is also estimated that we will send Public Law 480 food to East Pakistan. She will need 1½ million tons of grain a year over and above what she produces, which is about 11 million tons.

So over and above the amount which we will be providing in the foreign assistance bill will be the amount which will be sent to East Pakistan through Public Law 480, which will cost from $65 million to $170 million.

I would like to call the Senate's attention to what we have done in regard to the Pakistani tragedy. As of January 24, 1972, according to the State Department, all the governments of the world contributed $243,959,762 and the international voluntary agencies contributed $59,222,286, or a total of $303,182,048. These contributions were in cash, in counterpart funds, and in goods such as food, medical supplies, clothing, blankets, and so forth.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the U.S. contribution. The U.S. contribution was $90,057,000, and our voluntary agencies contributed $10,700,000, a total of $100,757,000, almost $101 million. In other words, the U.S. Government and U.S. voluntary agencies contributed one-third of the total world contribution to assist the Pakistani refugees in India.

Over and above that $101 million, the United States delivered $65 million in food and other essential relief, or over two-thirds of the $947 million the United Nations records as pledged by all countries.

So when we add the $65 million for East Pakistani relief to the $101 million, which was for Indian-Pakistani refugee relief, we have a total sum of $166 million which the United States has either provided or has pledged to use in East Pakistan and in India for East Pakistani relief.

This does not include additional U.S. contribution of food from earlier programs which arrived during mid-1971.

As against the $166 million which the United States and its various voluntary agencies have contributed, I would like to draw to the attention of the Senate what the U.S.S.R. has contributed. The U.S.S.R.'s contribution consisted of a portion of 100 million doses of smallpox vaccine, worth $1 million, 100,000 tons of rice, $20 million, and other commodities, $1,100,000, or a total of about $22 million, as compared with $166 million delivered by the United States.

So we have done a commendable job in this regard, and we have been in the forefront in helping our friends in East Pakistan in their tragedy.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, as I understand it, when the Senator from Illinois yields back his time and the Senator from Hawaii and I yield back our time, it will be possible for the Senator from Arkansas to offer a perfecting amendment. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. As far as I am concerned, I yield back my time.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I have just one further word of gratitude to the distinguished Senator from Hawaii and the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin for their recognition of the depth of suffering in Bangladesh and for their recognition of the U.S. moral responsibility in that part of the world—a moral responsibility which results from our having supplied Pakistan with some of the arms and military equipment by which the suffering and atrocities were caused.

There is in this amendment a limitation which restricts the U.S. contribution to 40 percent of all contributions from whatever sources. It is certainly my intent in offering this amendment that the administration make reasonable assumptions of the contributions of other nations and, on the basis of those assumptions, go forward with the distribution of aid right away, before it is too late, when the monsoons begin in April. The alternative to wait until other nations have made their contributions in order that we can calculate the amount we may contribute, would destroy the effectiveness of this assistance.

I am prepared to yield back my time.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, may I say I strongly endorse the principle. It makes sense. These are people who need help now. We should not base what we are doing on what the others are going to do, but should go ahead with ours, and we should move promptly.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the amendment has been yielded back.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read the amendment to the amendment, as follows:

Before the quotation marks at the end of the amendment insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That the funds appropriated under this paragraph shall be deducted from the sums provided under this title I".

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

When the Foreign Relations Committee first approved the authorization of $250 million for Pakistan refugee relief, it required that the money be taken out of other programs—the same as I propose with this amendment. But the committee's action was later reversed through use of Senator MUNDT's proxy.

For the last several years Congress has earmarked funds for population control programs—$125 million is earmarked for this fiscal year. Earmarking is an effective way for Congress to set priorities for the spending of foreign aid funds.

Earmarking for refugee relief will force the executive branch to rethink its aid priorities and result in additional emphasis on the side of humanitarian aid. This is the only justification for foreign aid that makes sense to most American taxpayers.

This approach will result in reducing the total in this bill for the regular foreign aid and military sales programs by $175 million, from $2.264 billion to $2.089 billion.

If my amendment is adopted, the total amount in this bill for the regular foreign aid program will still be $200 million more than Congress appropriated for the 1970 fiscal year. We had a $13-billion deficit in the administrative budget that year. This year it is expected to be $45 billion—more than three times as much, and yet we are increasing the amount for foreign aid.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield to the distinguished chairman.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I would like to support the Senator from Arkansas. I think this is a sensible and wise amendment. In doing so, I ask the Senator from Hawaii if he will handle the time in opposition to the amendment since I support it.

I think the amendment is sensible for several reasons. It would provide needed aid for Bangladesh. It would provide what is needed for this terrible disaster. As I understand the amendment, the funds would have to come out of other parts of title I of the bill.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Including the parts which the Senate has increased against the determination of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is correct. The $100 million is increased, yes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. It seems to me that is a sound way to operate. I think the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee is offering an amendment which reconciles our moral obligation to assist the people in Bangladesh as much as we possibly can with the urgent need to do all we can to hold down our expenditures at a time when we are running an enormous deficit.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin. Just to reiterate what he has said, this amendment would not decrease the amount which would be available for this purpose, which the Senator from Illinois has requested. It would merely require that it come out of funds that are appropriated under title I.

I want to make one other comment. There is no limit, of course, to Public Law 480 funds—that is really commodities—which would be available. That is a big element for helping on problems in the food area. There is nothing, as far as I know, that would limit the availability of this assistance for the refugees.

I am bound to make one other point about a comment of the Senator from Illinois. He says we are morally responsible because we have supplied arms.

If Senators will look at the record of our supplying arms, it is very difficult to find any place in the world of any consequence in which we have not supplied some arms. If we look at this military aid program—it has been cut back a little—but look back over the years, and there are very few countries, unless one looks to Chad, perhaps, or Mali. I am not sure whether we have sent anything into Chad, though I expect we have. I use Chad only as one of the more remote and less controversial countries. I am not sure whether we have sent anything into the Maldives Islands, and I am not sure whether we have sent anything into Mauritius, but there are at least 80 or so countries to which we have supplied arms.

So for anything that happens, under this theory, almost anywhere in the world, we are morally responsible to pick up the tab for reconstruction, rehabilitation, and so on. I really do not accept that kind of argument, that we are morally responsible for everyone's ills. I do accept that we have been extremely stupid, shortsighted, and misguided in the program of supplying arms all over the world. I will accept that argument, and maybe we should pay something for it, to pay for our sins. We are going to have to pay an awful lot, I expect, in Southeast Asia, for the extent to which we have destroyed those countries.

As far as India and Pakistan are concerned, fortunately, we did not destroy those countries ourselves; all we did was give them the vehicle, the means to do it themselves; but the motive, that is, the final causative factor, as they would say in a court of law, would be the Pakistanis themselves. They did not have to use those arms to murder those people. That was their decision, and we did not give them to them with the idea that they would use them for that purpose. We gave them to them for use against the Russians, against communism. This is a part of the ideological obsession that started back in 1947 and 1948. That was the reason we were giving them to them, to contain communism wherever it might raise its ugly head.

There is no evidence that Mujib was Communist, or that the revolution in East Pakistan was a Communist revolution. So they violated the understanding with which we gave them the arms. Of course, they had already violated it when they used them against India.

We certainly did not give them to them to use against India; but under this broad generalization that, having given them arms, they used them against India, then we ought to be responsible for all the ills of India, because they certainly caused India to spend a lot of money, and certainly did a lot of damage, in the war that they fought several years ago.

My amendment does not affect the amount available for the refugees. But there the problem should no longer be as great as it once was because, as I understand from reading the newspapers, many of the refugees are returning. It will be primarily an aid program to Bangladesh; and I do not have any objection to that, although, to keep our lines straight, we ought to authorize aid to Bangladesh.

The fact is that our Government has not yet recognized the existence of Bangladesh. We had a meeting yesterday afternoon to discuss this in an executive session of the Committee on Foreign Relations. There is a resolution sponsored by the Senator from South Carolina and others to recognize Bangladesh, but the fact is that our Government has not recognized Bangladesh. Nevertheless, this is, in fact, a program of aid to Bangladesh. That is what it will amount to. I only point that out as one of the reasons why we ought to take a close look at the matter.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me so that I can ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I also ask for the yeas and nays on final passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. My question is, I assume that this aid to Bangladesh the committee chairman is referring to is really to the people of Bangladesh or what was formerly East Pakistan, rather than the Government of Bangladesh, which does not exist as far as the United States is concerned at the present time; is that correct?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is right, we do not recognize it, although I understand that a number of countries recognized it today.

But as I have pointed out, it seems to me that things have changed, that this is no longer a refugee program primarily, as it was presented in the committee when we passed on it. This aid will now go more to a country known as Bangladesh.

Mr. AIKEN. What the Senator means is aid to the refugees and the suffering people who are now in what was formerly East Pakistan, but is now called Bangladesh. It is the people he is thinking of, not the government, is it not?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Well, that is true of all these governments. I mean, even if it is a development loan or anything, it is the people we are thinking of; the government is only the vehicle through which the loans are made or sought. I agree that in all these programs, it is the people whom we consider as the final recipients of our largesse.

Mr. AIKEN. Yes. My chairman has been a very strong advocate of multilateral assistance to various peoples in need in different parts of the world. That would apply to this additional assistance to the needy people, the suffering people of what is now Bangladesh as well?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Well, I do think it is better administered through—

Mr. AIKEN. I personally think that. While I am in favor of relieving the suffering, I think it should be done on a multilateral basis rather than a unilateral basis, although that is directly contrary to my belief as to how we should deal with Latin American countries.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. AIKEN. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Well, let me point out that—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time the Senator from Arkansas yielded himself has expired.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

The conference report on the authorization for refugee aid reads:

Such assistance shall be distributed to the maximum extent practicable, under the auspices of and by international institutions and relief agencies of United States voluntary agencies.

That is the requirement. Purely because of administrative problems, if nothing else, we are going to have to do it with the cooperation of that government. Governments do not usually welcome outsiders coming in without even asking "by your leave." But that does not bother me very much.

Mr. AIKEN. Would that not be up to the various organizations with whom we deal, whom we work through?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I imagine the Government of Bangladesh will have something to say about it.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I would like to point out that the Stevenson amendment does contemplate a very important element of international assistance, and provides that the United States shall not give more than 40 percent of the assistance. I realize that does not make it multilateral, but it does require that other countries enter into this assistance.

Mr. AIKEN. Well, until we recognize the Government of Bangladesh, until it has been established as a government, and more than 10 or 15 countries have recognized it, it seems to me that we should deal through the multilateral organizations in that and probably other parts of Asia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 2 additional minutes have expired. Who yields time?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Hawaii yield me 3 minutes?

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, how much time do we have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. FONG. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. STEVENSON. I thank the Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. President, there is no way in which this aid could be provided except through multinational agencies. Without recognition of Bangladesh, the United States will not and cannot establish bilateral relationships which could be used to distribute this assistance to the people of Bangladesh. So, until that time, all the moneys appropriated by this bill would have to be funneled to the people of Bangladesh through such agencies—all of them multilateral—as the United Nations, UNICEF, the International Red Cross, and the International Rescue Committee.

I am hesitant about embarking on a moral discussion, but the point should be made that the moral responsibility is to people who are suffering and in need. It is a responsibility which has been recognized by countries throughout the world. The United States, it seems to me, has a special responsibility in this case, not only because we did—to a rather limited extent—provide some of the arms which were used by Pakistan with which to commit atrocities in Bangladesh, but beyond that, and more significantly, we did nothing in Pakistan to restrain the regime of Yahya Khan from murdering the Bengalis, at the same time we were restraining the Indians from liberating the Bengalis. That is what, in my mind, makes this a moral question and, to a degree, a moral responsibility of the United States.

I have to oppose the substitute amendment because, as I understand it, its effect would be cut other programs in this bill by a quarter of a billion dollars.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair points out to the Senator from Illinois that this is a perfecting amendment, rather than a substitute amendment. It merely adds additional language. The Senator has been referring to it as a substitute amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. I thank the Chair for the correction. My remarks apply to the perfecting amendment.

If the administration did decide to make available funds—under my amendment as perfected—to the people of Bangladesh, it would then take the funds from other programs for which Congress has appropriated moneys; and in so doing, it seems to me, it would be effectively overcoming the clear intent of Congress. It is a back door way of giving the administration far more power over funds appropriated by Congress for the programs established in our authorizing and appropriating legislation.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a clarification?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield on the Senator's time.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The administration is not forced to spend this money for that purpose. They do not have to spend it.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is my point.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I mean, under the Senator's amendment. My amendment does not change that aspect of it. They can impound it as they want. They have impounded $12 billion. The Senator's amendment does not make them spend it. There is no way to make them spend it. The Senator is making the point here that in some way my amendment changes the pressure upon them to spend it for this purpose. If the administration does not want to spend it for that, even if my amendment is not adopted, they do not have to do so.

All I want to do is to clarify the matter. I do not want to leave the Senate under a misapprehension as to the effect of it.

Mr. STEVENSON. The effect of my amendment is to provide $250 million for the relief of refugees. The effect of the perfecting amendment would be to require that all that sum of money come out of other programs. That is my point. The effect of the perfecting amendment is to cut back other appropriations for foreign aid by $250 million.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. But they do not have to spend it, under the Senator's amendment. If their sense of priority is not the same as the Senator's they will not spend it, under his amendment, either.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understand that. But I offered my amendment as an addition, not a diminution, in the bill. Therefore, I still must oppose the perfecting amendment of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FONG. I yield 1 minute to the Senator.

Mr. AIKEN. It is my understanding that if the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is agreed to, the funds would have to be deducted from some other appropriation which is contemplated by title II. That means that if we voted to increase the aid for the people of Bangladesh by $50 million, it could be taken out of the $175 million which is already included in the bill.

It could be taken out of the Alliance for Progress, for which we voted yesterday, and could nullify our vote of yesterday, or it could be taken out of development loans. Certainly, it would not come out of administrative expenses. Possibly it could be deducted from military assistance. But if it is the purpose to take it out of military assistance, I think it should be so specified. Otherwise, the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas could completely nullify the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois; or it could nullify or could repeal the vote which was taken on this floor yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired. Who yields time?

Mr. FONG. I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator.

Mr. AIKEN. With this bill going to conference, I think it would be better to accept the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, because we would undoubtedly make some adjustments in the conference committee, anyway.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes on the amendment.

I vigorously oppose this amendment. This is as devastating an amendment as I have ever seen.

Mr. AIKEN. Which one?

Mr. FONG. The amendment by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

This amendment would destroy the whole foreign aid bill. Its destruction effect on our foreign assistance program is equivalent to that of a nuclear bomb.

Let us look at what the Senator has done. He would undo everything we have done so far, everything that the Foreign Relations Committee has done, everything that Congress has done.

Under title I, the fiscal year 1972 appropriation was $1.1 billion. The budget estimate was $1.6 billion. The authorization—and the distinguished Senator from Arkansas is chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee—was $1.2 billion. The continuing resolution which we operated under, and are still operating on, is $1.2 billion. The House passed $1 billion under title I, and the Senate Appropriations Committee recommended a little over $1 billion. By addition of the $100 million which went for the Alliance for Progress, from $50 million to $150 million, that raised the figures from approximately $1 billion in the Senate bill to $1.1 billion.

Let us see what this does. It takes out the $175 million which is already in the bill for Pakistani relief, reducing it to $925 million. Then, if the Administration decides to take the $250 million for Bangladesh relief, it reduces it another $250 million, to $675 million.

So what we will have is $675 million in title I as distinguished from the amount of approximately $1 billion as reported by the committee, as distinguished from $1.2 billion as passed by Congress in the authorization bill.

So, I say, Mr. President, that what the distinguished Senator from Arkansas (Mr. FULBRIGHT) has done has been really to put a nuclear bomb in the bill. He is really trying to destroy the whole bill.

I do not know what his intentions are, whether he intends to give any money to Bangladesh at all. He may not want to give any money to Bangladesh. But in the authorization provisions we have, the sum of $250 million is earmarked for Bangladesh relief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BENTSEN). The time of the Senator from Hawaii has expired.

Mr. FONG. I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I do not know whether he wants to give any money to Bangladesh, whether he wants to provide nothing for the Alliance for Progress, whether he wants to provide nothing for worldwide technical assistance, or whether he thinks no money should go to American schools and hospitals abroad, no money to international organizations and programs, no money to the Alliance for Progress, no money for development loans, because the money would have to come from all those figures which we have worked so diligently and so carefully to bring before the Senate.

Every item has been carefully worked on before the Appropriations Committee presented the bill to the Senate.

Now we are here debating on one amendment. Are we going to increase the amount we want to give to Bangladesh relief from $175 million to $250 million, or are we not? If we want to, then let us vote for that.

If we do not want to do so, then let us vote against it.

But, let us not say that if we give $250 million to Bangladesh relief we will force you to take the increase, which is another $75 million plus $175 million, which we have already appropriated under the bill according to the action of the Appropriations Committee, and say that all of that will have to come out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Hawaii has expired.

Mr. FONG. I yield myself 1 additional minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii is recognized for 1 additional minute.

Mr. FONG. So you can see, Mr. President, that I do not know what is the real intent of this provision by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas. If his intent is to "gut" the whole bill, then it will work. If his intent is to reduce the amounts going to all the other programs then, I think, he has done a great disservice to put in that amendment.

I ask my colleagues to vote against the amendment because it is a devastating amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Hawaii has expired. Who yields time?

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I must say that I do not particularly enjoy these repeated forays with my chairman. I am only sustained by the fact that he is a thoroughly skilled parliamentarian and that I hope to be with him in many other struggles if he will forgive me on this one.

I must, Mr. President, in good conscience, identify with the position taken by Senators FONG, AIKEN, and STEVENSON with regard to this particular amendment.

We went through this particular approach in the committee as well. It is clear that if we do not agree basically with the proposition that a sum of money of roughly $2,900 million should be devoted to foreign aid and that that is a fair application of our priorities, then, of course, we have an absolute right to find every way we can to cut it down. This is one way to do it. As the Senator from Hawaii has stated, it is an atom bomb placed in the bill, but it is a way to do it, and it is a perfectly proper way to do it. But if we are satisfied with the overall budgetary situation, in spite of all of our troubles, trying not to be hard-hearted or to have the hard feelings of a rich man walking along the streets of the world, which is a lot poorer than we are then we have got to devote something to the cause of world relief and world assistance. All other developed nations who are far poorer than we are engaged in such programs.

I know of nothing that would commend itself to us for humanitarian action more than the dreadful tragedies which have afflicted those people of the Indian subcontinent—especially in view of our own rather touchy relationship—in their efforts to disenthral themselves from those who have been barbaric to them; to wit, the Government and Army of West Pakistan.

Under these circumstances, one can speak of this in human and personal terms.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator from Hawaii yield me 1 more minute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time in opposition to the amendment has expired.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute on the bill to the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 1 additional minute.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, may we have order in the Senate so that the Senator may be heard?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please come to order.

The Senator from New York may proceed.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, if it appeals to our hearts that these people who have been so terribly and tragically decimated by flood, conflagration, war, and fratricide shall now get help from us, with feelings from our hearts of generosity, the money should certainly not, and I repeat, not come out of the—if we do it and do it that way—other development assistance and humanitarian programs we have in title I of the bill. Each must stand or fall on its own.

In spite of our own troubles in this country, we are not so poor that we cannot heed our consciences and say that we cannot afford this money to help these people.

I strongly urge that the perfecting amendment be defeated and the Stevenson amendment be sustained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BENTSEN). The Senator from Arkansas (Mr. FULBRIGHT) has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I do not know that I can add anything, especially as there is no one here to listen except those already committed—which is the usual situation on the floor of the Senate.

For the RECORD, though, I should point out, on the question of our moral obligation that we should help Bangladesh because we gave arms to Pakistan, that Nigeria, for example, was given arms by us. They had an insurrection there and a lot of people were killed. I guess we should have had an amendment to the bill to pick up the tab or provide some relief for that.

We have also given arms to El Salvador, Honduras, and so forth—as a matter of fact, I have a list in my hand of 46 countries to which we have given arms. This is grant military aid. Many more countries we have given what are called sales—they are not really sales, but a kind of sales, and so forth. Thus, the idea that we are responsible for everyone does not appeal to me.

All my amendment would provide is that if we want the Government to do it, we should give so much money up to $250 million. They may still do so. The difference between my amendment and that of the Senator from Illinois is that mine takes it out of the money available under title I of the bill. That is the only difference.

Neither does the amendment of the Senator from Illinois force the administration to spend this money on this problem. It simply authorizes them to do so. If they think, in their idea of priority, that it comes above in importance to other items in the bill there is great and wide power to transfer. The President has much discretion to change the spending levels a great deal.

All my amendment seeks to do is not to increase the overall amount of the bill, because this country is in such dire financial straits.

So, that is all there is to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, if agreed to, would deduct another $175 million from the amount we already voted on in the committee on the committee bill.

We have $175 million for Pakistani relief. Now, the Senator from Arkansas proposes that we will take $250 million from all of the programs. So, that means that we will take $175 million out.

I say this will really gut and destroy the whole bill.

I urge my colleagues to vote against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. I announce that the Senator from Georgia (Mr. GAMBRELL), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE), the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON), the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. McCLELLAN), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. MCINTYRE), the Senator from Utah (Mr. MOSS), the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE), the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. BAYH), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), and the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. HARRIS), the Senator from Iowa (Mr. HUGHES), the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. JORDAN), the Senator from Montana (Mr. METCALF), the Senator from Virginia (Mr. SPONGE), are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. MCGEE), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), are on official business.

On this vote, the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. McCLELLAN) is paired with the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON).

If present and voting, the Senator from Arkansas would vote "yea" and the Senator from Washington would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL) is paired with the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN).

If present and voting, the Senator from Alaska would vote "yea" and the Senator from South Dakota would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) is paired with the Senator from Georgia (Mr. GAMBRELL).

If present and voting, the Senator from West Virginia would vote "nay" and the Senator from Georgia would vote "yea."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON), would vote "nay."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ALIOTT), the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BELL-MON), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. HRUSKA), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. SAXBE), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. TAFT), the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD) is paired with the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER). If present and voting, the Senator from Oregon would vote "yea" and the Senator from Texas would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 45, as follows:

So Mr. FULBRIGHT's amendment was rejected.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment, as modified, of the Senator from Illinois (Mr. STEVENSON) (putting the question).

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

PRIVILEGE OF THE FLOOR

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Norvill Jones, of the staff of the Foreign Relations Committee, be permitted to remain on the floor during the remainder of the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PUBLIC SAFETY PROGRAM

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 11, between lines 8 and 9, insert the following:

Sec. 114. None of the funds appropriated or made available pursuant to this Act to carry out part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 shall be used for continuing public safety programs of the Agency for International Development.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, on my amendment, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes.

In its illustrative 1972 budget, the Agency for International Development requested $29,423,000 for carrying out public safety programs in more than 25 countries of the world. Of that $5,455,000 was to be from technical assistance, $20,573,000 from supporting assistance, and $3,400,000 from supporting assistance loans.

The proposed program and the detail of its financing are set forth in the table which I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Countries and regions	Supporting assistance	Technical assistance	Supporting assistance loans	Countries and regions	Supporting assistance	Technical assistance	Supporting assistance loans
Southeast Asia:				Costa Rica		$198,000
South Vietnam	$11,148,000			Dominican Republic		370,000

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, over the years, I have come to realize that U.S. participation in the highly sensitive area of public safety and police training unavoidably opens the door to those who seek to identify the United States with every act of local police brutality or oppression in any country in which this program operates. It matters little whether the charges can be substantiated; they are made almost daily; they are widely circulated; they obtain credibility in some quarters; and they inevitably stigmatize the total U.S. aid effort.

I believe that in undeveloped areas of the world, the costs of public safety programs are better left to be underwritten from local resources and the U.S. assistance effort directed toward less sensitive and better justified areas of concern. As a move in this direction, my amendment would eliminate all public safety programs funded from technical assistance grants and development loans. This action would not, however, bar public safety programs in Southeast Asia, for which $20,573,000 in supporting assistance funds is requested, and concerning which I will not comment at this time.

That program has been widely publicized in a different connection.

While I question the need for continuing this highly controversial program, the Agency for International Development has testified in strong support of these activities which involve the operation of the International Policy Academy and the stationing of 335 public safety advisers abroad. Having achieved the limited objectives for which they were established, public safety programs in 23 countries have been terminated since 1962.

Public safety programs in Chile and Jordan were terminated in fiscal year 1971 and ongoing programs in Brazil and Korea will be concluded by the end of fiscal 1972. In trying to justify this program's continuance, an AID official has made the following observation which should be considered in passing judgment on the program:

Violence has been a common factor in many of the world's societies and one which frustrates the effort of the people to realize their aspirations and also of governments in attempting to govern. Violence has been chosen by special interest groups, political factions and elements at both extremes of the political spectrum. Based on the recent experience of the 1960s, it is clear that during the decade of the '70s the task of governments in these societies will be much more important during this period. This importance lies not only in the civil security forces' ability to protect the lives, property and basic human rights of the citizens, but in their ability to create a climate for orderly change. Violence perpetrated by any group in society should be prevented and suppressed.

In several countries, which have requested and are receiving Public Safety assistance, there are reports and allegations that some members of the police forces engage in illegal activity in the conduct of their business. We do not condone and do deplore this kind of behavior which is antithetical to the objectives of the Public Safety program and to the modern concept of law enforcement which the program attempts to inculcate at all levels in police forces it aids. The best chance for overcoming this lack of professionalism is the conduct of police operations is through technical assistance and training provided by the Public Safety program.

U.S. Public Safety assistance is a low cost, low profile activity. Given adequate resources, it can be effective in influencing police leadership toward the professional and humane use of their resources and it can assist in the development of police abilities to prevent serious threats to internal order.

Unfortunately, there is a difference between can and is. I question the effectiveness of these programs in light of the adverse effects that result from our being so closely associated with local police brutality and consider further involvement in these programs to be against the best interests of the United States.

We have troubles enough with police/community relations in our own society. I suggest that our Government's efforts would be better directed to this, and our own crime problem, rather than to trying to teach foreigners how to run their police departments.

Mr. President, the overall effect of this, together with other aspects of our program, is to identify this Nation with the preservation of the status quo in all respects in all the developing countries, in which there are many people who believe that some changes in their economic or political systems are warranted. The United States is identified in nearly every respect with the preservation of the status quo in any effort to improve the lot of the people in those countries.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. This amendment was brought to the attention of the full committee, and we agreed that, because it was controversial with many people, it should be brought up on the floor rather than put in by the committee.

I think it is necessary for us to stop our aid in public safety programs because, as the Senator from Arkansas has said, not only do they become clearly identified with suppression of human rights, but also with the most reactionary and military regimes.

It is true, as the Senator from Arkansas said, that they may serve a useful purpose, but what the Senator from Arkansas would do in his amendment would be to provide that public safety programs and the police forces of those countries be run with local tax funds in accordance with the way the local governments want to set priorities.

I know what resistance there would be in this country to having a Federal police force. People would resist such a move. I know some people say the FBI is that. I do not think so. I have great respect for the FBI. I think it has done a marvelous job. But if we had a Federal police force supported with Federal funds, we would be concerned with all the effects that would have on the civil liberties of the people of our country.

What we are saying is that U.S. AID funds should be used to help countries without becoming involved with their police forces. These have violated human rights time and time again in the most brutal and tragic ways—Brazil is the most conspicuous example. There is no reason why the United States should unnecessarily be identified as the country which is supplying the police force to maintain order.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I support the Senator's amendment.

Once again, I ask the Senator from Hawaii if he will control the time in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I appreciate the support of the Senator.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may need.

I rise in opposition to the amendment. The main thrust of these funds, under the public safety programs, is to have an efficient civil security force in the countries that are just developing. Many of these countries do not have an efficient police force and they need to have trained men to stop the inception of riots and the inception of other criminal activities.

Since 1954 the United States has provided assistance to police organizations around the world through the foreign economic assistance program. We must remember that we have only 4 or 5 more months left of fiscal year 1972 and that we have been operating on a continuing resolution to take care of the programs which are now in existence.

The primary thrust of this program has been to develop the institutional capability of civil security forces to maintain peace and order so that economic and social development can proceed and the affairs of government can be conducted within a constitutional framework.

By providing this assistance, civil police capabilities have been improved, thus permitting recipient governments to cope with internal disorders in their earliest phases rather than having to use military force when such disorders reach an unmanageable level.

Some police actions have been described as brutal. Many police forces in our own country, likewise, have been accused of police brutality. But the main thrust of this program is to see that the recipient countries have efficient police forces so they can nip insipient disorders in the bud, so they do not have to resort to military force later.

This program has been working very well, and it has been phasing out. During this same period the program level for assistance to 30 countries outside Southeast Asia has been reduced from $7.98 million in 1967 to $5.45 million in fiscal 1972.

Mr. President, we are talking about a very insignificant sum of money—$5.45 million to 23 countries.

Which countries and what amounts are we talking about? For example, for the Congo, $1 million; for Ghana, $106,000; for Liberia, $203,000; for Tunisia, $125,000.

Certainly these countries need to upgrade their police forces.

Likewise, we are appropriating for Jordan, $65,000. For Pakistan, $280,000. For Bolivia, $115,000. For Brazil, $174,000.

So it can be seen that the amounts appropriated for these countries are modest.

To abruptly terminate all assistance to countries other than those in Southeast Asia at this time would be very unwise and could waste a large part of the limited investment already made in those countries.

The expenditure of this amount of money is for equipment, for training, for bringing their people over to take a look at our police forces so they may learn from us, and for sending our technical advisers to these countries. So Senators can see that most of the money appropriated under this program is for expenditures for our technicians, and for foreigners to come to our country to learn what is happening here.

This is particularly true in terms of the major effort now being mounted to attack the worldwide problem of international narcotics control. AID's public safety program will play a key role in the total U.S. Government effort. It is imperative that civil police institutions be strengthened in order that individual country narcotic control laws can be enforced effectively. Specific plans for assistance to various countries are now being formed in coordination with the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs and the Bureau of Customs. Fourteen of these countries are now receiving some type of public safety assistance through AID.

Latin American is also rapidly becoming a major conduit for international narcotics traffic into the United States. Six countries, all in Central America and the Caribbean area and which are now receiving public safety assistance, may also require assistance in narcotics control.

In addition, the Congress has now enacted legislation—section 481 of the Foreign Assistance Act—which authorizes the President to conclude drug control agreements with other countries and to furnish assistance to any country or international organization for drug control purposes.

Mr. President, the significant impact of this restriction would be to force the closing of eight international police academies, where nearly 90 percent of the students expected during fiscal 1972 will come from 23 countries. It will result in the abandonment of public safety efforts to work with any but three countries in Indochina. Such assistance must be authorized in the Foreign Assistance Act and appropriated in part I of the Foreign Assistance and Related Programs Appropriations Act. Therefore, any effort to eliminate public safety activities outside Southeast Asia is contrary to a congressional view expressed so recently.

Opportunities for preventing further spread of international narcotics traffic and growth of related law enforcement problems cannot be disregarded. Although the United States cannot enforce the narcotics laws of another nation we do have a responsibility to assist in an area of national urgency through training and improved organization under the public safety program.

Mr. President, I think we would be doing a very sad thing if we were to disallow the use of this money for public safety programs. It would be most tragic because the main thrust of this program is to really give to the developing countries a good civil police security force in order to hold down the trafficking in narcotics, to nip subversive elements in the bud, and to protect constitutionally developed and elected governments.

So I oppose the amendment very vigorously, Mr. President.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, from year to year I have been a very strong supporter of our foreign aid program. I have done so because I have always believed that the effort was made in the spirit of brotherhood, and not in a self-seeking way to promote the prestige or enlarge the image of America throughout the world. We have spent billions of dollars in order to accomplish that.

But I dare say the program that we are talking about now, that has been outlined by the Senator from Hawaii, has been counterproductive. We are talking about a civil police force—First of all, this is a national concern. It is a matter of the sovereignty of the particular nation involved. Those people should furnish their own police forces. They should train their own policemen.

No one is advocating here that they do away with their policemen. All we are saying is, it is not the business of the United States of America to create a police force in any nation to guarantee the tenure of any specific dictator or any particular government. Frankly, in many instances, as the Senator from Arkansas has pointed out, we have been identified as being against a sound reform movement that might be salutary in that particular country.

We have said time and time again that America should not be the policeman of the world, and yet we are policemen by proxy here. I do not see why the United States of America should maintain an international police school. For what purpose? The first thing any nation does to protect its own security is to build up a good, formidable police force. To say that if we withhold this aid these police forces will go out of existence is something I just cannot believe at all. I say very frankly I think this is one part of the foreign aid bill that does irreparable harm to the foreign aid program as a whole.

We have seen instances time and time again where these civil police forces, as they are called here, have really become stormtroopers. We have had our experience with Hitler, who, piecemeal, wanted to suppress this and suppress that. Finally he wound up as a dictator and brought us into World War II.

I say if we are going to cut this foreign aid bill at all, this is the one best place to cut it, and I shall vote for the cut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute.

As I have stated, the amounts of money here are used for the purpose of securing equipment, of sending advisers overseas to teach police work, and to have the students of recipient countries come over and learn some of our police techniques. We are not trying to set up police states in these countries. We are just teaching them advanced methods of civil security and public safety, and that is all we are doing for them.

This work is being phased out. We have operated under the continuing resolution now for approximately 7 months, and we have only 5 months to go. The program outside of Southeast Asia involves around $5 million. It is being phased out, and this is no time for us to cut it.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FONG. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. The Senator uses the expression that this is for "civil security protection" reasons. What do we mean by that? It certainly is not protection against an invader. It is an internal affair.

Mr. FONG. It is an internal affair.

Mr. PASTORE. Is it our business to get mixed up in it?

Mr. FONG. Many of our programs involve internal affairs. We have gotten into the matter of helping people who are starving and who are sick—

Mr. PASTORE. Oh, but that is a different matter. We want to put food in empty stomachs. I just voted against the Fulbright amendment that would affect the award of money to feed the starving people in Bangladesh. But there is no analogy between food and police.

Mr. FONG. We have sent our advisers over there, and we have brought their people over here, to study educational methods. This is nothing but a question of education.

Mr. PASTORE. That is not the way I have heard it. I have been with this program for a long time, and this is one element of the program with which I have become very weary. I think it is wrong to support this type of program. All that these security guards have been able to do is protect the bastion of authority in their particular State. Any time anyone speaks out against that authority, he goes to jail, sometimes without trial, and America is being blamed for it in many instances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, as I recall the days and the hours and hours spent in the Foreign Relations Committee—

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COOPER. During all the time we put in on this measure in the Foreign Relations Committee, to the best of my recollection this subject was not mentioned. I may be in error, but I do not recall it.

I know that this has been referred to as a program which might prevent police brutality. I would like to say it is purely an educational program, in the same way that the FBI trains people, and in the same way as this Congress has appropriated money to assist in training local police. There is evidence of police brutality all over the world, and I am sure it exists in this country. But I think that countries which have systems such as ours, and the more advanced countries in Europe, would be more likely to educate and train these people in ways which would prevent police brutality. I think that is correct.

Also, we are engaged now in a great program throughout the world to try to bring narcotics and drug traffic under control, and this will be one element of the training which will be undertaken. I think many subjects have been discussed here which might be of much more importance, but this is important.

I do not go on the assumption that all our police are brutal. I would think it would be better to train these forces in the use of more humane methods. It is basically an educational program.

I hope the amendment will be defeated. Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 5 minutes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. President, I agree with the sentiments of the Senator from Rhode Island. It reminded me of a rather symbolic experience.

I think one of our first involvements in South Vietnam was a thorough public safety project in which we employed Michigan State University. I believe it is the same university of which the present Administrator of AID was president. We were engaged in teaching them police organization. Mr. Fishel of that school became very friendly with Mr. Diem.

One thing led to another. Diem spent time in the Maryknoll Seminary in New York State and became acquainted with some important figures in this country. He went back and we helped make him president and gave him a police force, and we are still there protecting his people.

It is rather interesting that out of this kind of program grew that very long and intimate connection with South Vietnam.

It is a very important program. It involves us in the internal affairs of many countries. But, for the life of me, I do not understand why the Senator from Hawaii feels that we should become involved in the creation of the local police forces of these countries. I think it now involves 25 countries. It is no small matter.

We already train army officers in more countries than that. We become identified with their police forces and whatever people think of their police forces. We know in this country how popular police forces are. I support our police forces. But we know that in many parts of this country the police are very controversial. I think it is most unfortunate, but that happens to be human nature. We also have become identified with foreign army officers. We bring thousands—and we have brought tens of thousands—of army officers to this country, to train them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield myself 1 additional minute. We bring them here to teach them our most modern methods of how to stifle any kind of disorder of insurrection. That, in its proper context, is an essential part of an organized society.

I agree with and I underscore what the Senator from Rhode Island has said. Essential as these activities are to organized society, they are essentially local, and a big country like ours should not inject itself into those activities. We are being accused by our enemies all over the world of being of an imperialistic nature, seeking new and more subtle ways than, say, the British to control every part of the world we can by investments, by training of their military people, by training of their policemen, and other means.

So I think it is against our interests to keep this program in operation. It is not just a matter of money or saving money. It is against our interest.

I want to correct a misapprehension that I think was implicit in a comment just made, that my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois reduced the amount for the suffering or starving, or what have you, of people. My amendment did not reduce the amount. It only provided that the amount provided should come out of the overall amount in the bill. There was flexibility for the administration to take that amount from other less important activities. I did not want the record to show that I reduced the amount.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. It is a question of how one construes the flexibility. My belief was that it might have to be taken out of a more essential program, and I considered it a limitation in that respect. But I do not pretend for one moment that my heart is any bigger than that of the Senator from Arkansas. I hope he understands that.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. FONG. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the amendment has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. I announce that the Senator from Georgia (Mr. GAMBRELL), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE), the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Iowa (Mr. HUGHES), the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON), the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. JORDAN), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. McCLELLAN), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. McGOVERN), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. MCINTYRE), the Senator from Utah (Mr. MOSS), the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE), the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH), the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. ELLENDER), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), and the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. MCGEE) and the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) are on official business.

On this vote, the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. ELLENDER) is paired with the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON).

If present and voting, the Senator from Louisiana would vote "yea" and the Senator from Washington would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) is paired with the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON).

If present and voting, the Senator from West Virginia would vote "yea" and the Senator from Washington would vote "nay."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. McCLELLAN) and the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. McGOVERN) would vote "yea."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ALLOTT), the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BELLMON), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD), the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. HRUSKA), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. JORDAN), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. SAXBE), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. TAFT), the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD) is paired with the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER). If present and voting, the Senator from Oregon would vote "yea" and the Senator from Texas would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 34, as follows:

So Mr. FULBRIGHT's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Berry, one of its leading clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2097) to establish a Special Action Office for Drug Abuse Prevention and to concentrate the resources of the Nation against the problem of drug abuse, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

FOREIGN ASSISTANCE AND RELATED PROGRAMS APPROPRIATIONS, 1972

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12067) making appropriations for foreign assistance and related programs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1972, and for other purposes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WEICKER). The clerk will report the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arkansas (Mr. FULBRIGHT) proposes an amendment:

On page 2, line 6, strike out "$165,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$140,000,000".

On page 4, lines 11 and 12, strike out "$150,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$100,000,000".

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT—TIME LIMITATION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time on the pending amendment be limited to 20 minutes, the time to be equally divided between the sponsor of the amendment and the ranking minority member.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, although the bill reported by the Appropriations Committee is a far better bill than that passed by the House, it did not reduce the total enough. And now even the committee's modest cuts have been partially offset by the Senate's vote to add $100 million for the Alliance for Progress.

I offer an amendment to reduce the amount for worldwide development loans by $50 million, from $150 to $100 million, and that for worldwide technical assistance by $25 million, from $165 to $140 million.

My amendment would reduce the total in this bill for the regular foreign aid and military sales items, titles I and II, from $2.339 billion to $2.264 billion. This is still $375 million more than Congress appropriated for these same programs in the 1970 fiscal year. I remind my colleagues that in fiscal year 1970 we had a budget deficit of only $13 billion. The official estimate for the administrative budget deficit this fiscal year is $45 billion, and, judging from past experience, likely to go much higher. My amendment will reduce that massive deficit by $75 million.

The new money appropriated by this bill is, by no means, all that will be available for development lending and technical assistance. Repayments on past loans, carryovers and funds from other sources which will be available for new loans under terms of this bill total $281 million, which, when added to the $100 million in new money allowed under my amendment, will make a total of $381 million for loans outside of Latin America. There will also be $15 million more available for technical assistance, to be added to the $140 million in new money proposed by my amendment, making a total of $155 million. I might point out that the administration suspended further lending to India and Pakistan and for those two countries alone $330 million in loans was proposed for this fiscal year. That action should be taken into account in determining how much the Senate provides for the loan program.

As of December 31, 1971, only $59 million has been obligated for development loans under the continuing resolution authority. At this rate the $281 million that would be available under my amendment will last, not just for the rest of this year, but for another 2 years. And, as for technical assistance, only $95 million was committed in the first half of the fiscal year. My amendment would, thus, require only a slight cutback in the current spending rate. There is no reason whatsoever for glutting the foreign aid pipeline further.

I call attention, also, to the fact that the committee has included a separate item of $125 million for population activities, which have heretofore been funded out of the development lending and technical assistance programs. In effect, this action frees $125 million in loans and grants that would otherwise be used only for population activities. My amendment will reduce these programs to reflect, at least partially, this change in the source of funding.

Mr. President, I do hope that the Senate will support this very modest reduction in these two items.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I oppose this amendment very vigorously.

The amendment would reduce the amount of the worldwide technical assistance from $165 million, which the Appropriations Committee has recommended, to $140 million.

The amount in 1971 was $166,750,000.

The budget estimate requested by the administration was for $232,929,000. The authorization was $175 million.

This is the authorization which was just passed last week.

The continuing resolution which we have been operating under for the past 6 or 7 months was $165,272,000. The committee recommended $165 million. This amendment would reduce that by $25 million.

Mr. President, when the President of the United States recommended that we follow the Nixon doctrine in our worldwide policy, he told us in no uncertain terms that we must provide more technical assistance to our allies and friends. Instead of providing more assistance to our allies and friends, this amendment would cut down the technical assistance that will be given to our allies and friends at a time when we are reducing our military assistance to them, we say, "You must take care of yourselves militarily. We will give you all the help we can to bolster your economy to see that you remain viable." This amendment on the other hand would cut down the amount so that we will be offering these countries, after we withdraw from these countries militarily and in many other ways, less than we have been offering them previously.

As I have said, in fiscal 1971, we appropriated $166 million. The amendment seeks to reduce that amount to $140 million, whereas the committee had agreed on a sum of $165 million. The other part of the amendment deals with the Development Loan Fund, on which we have agreed on $150 million. The amendment seeks to reduce that amount by $50 million, or to $100 million.

I invite the Senate's attention to the fact that the fiscal 1971 appropriation—that is, the appropriation last year—was for $420 million. The budget estimate as presented by the administration was for $400 million. The authorization was for $250 million. We have been operating under a continuing resolution providing $550,779,000. The House appropriation on this item was $250 million, and the Senate has cut the House appropriation by $100 million. This amendment seeks to cut the House appropriation by another $50 million.

In other words, this amendment, if agreed to, will gut the Development Loan Fund appropriation, and we will be unable to make loans which I believe have been negotiated and which we have committed ourselves to make.

This amendment, like all other amendments, again seeks to cut down, so that our program will be ineffective in our worldwide commitments as to what we can do to strengthen the economy and viability of the countries that need help.

I ask Senators to reject the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do Senators yield back the remainder of their time?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. FONG. I yield back the rest of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. I announce that the Senator from Georgia (Mr. GAMBRELL), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE), the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Iowa (Mr. HUGHES), the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON), the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. JORDAN), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. McCLELLAN), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. MCINTYRE), the Senator from Utah (Mr. MOSS), the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE), the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON), and the Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. MCGEE) and the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) are absent because of official business.

On this vote, the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN) is paired with the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH).

If present and voting, the Senator from South Dakota would vote "nay" and the Senator from West Virginia would vote "yea."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON) and the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) would each vote "nay."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ALLOTT), the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BELLMON), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. COTTON), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN), the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. HRUSKA), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. JORDAN), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. SAXBE), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. TAFT), the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) is absent because of illness.

If present and voting, the Senator from Ohio (Mr. TAFT) and the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) would each vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 41, as follows:

So Mr. FULBRIGHT's amendment was rejected.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, on Wednesday I introduced an amendment to the foreign assistance appropriation bill which increased the amount for the Alliance for Progress Development Loan from $50,000,000 to $150,000,000. In my haste to submit the amendment for consideration, I inadvertently left out the distinguished Senator from Minnesota (Mr. HUMPHREY) as an original cosponsor. I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that Senator HUMPHREY be listed as a cosponsor on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CALIFORNIAN SERVES ETHIOPIA

Mr. TUNNEY. Mr. President, in authorizing and appropriating funds for the Agency for International Development, Congress has critically appraised the Agency, its purposes, its functions, and its effectiveness. This is our continuing responsibility to the citizens of this country. A number of us have urged our colleagues to continue their commitment to encourage economic and social development of the lesser developed countries.

I recently had the opportunity to visit with a constituent of mine, Daniel J. O'Laughlin, of San Leandro, on his return from 5 months' work with credit cooperatives in Ethiopia, and what I learned has only reinforced my conviction that development funds, some of which AID is channeling increasingly through and to private organizations, are a wise and useful expenditure of the taxpayers' dollars.

I understand that the Ethiopian credit cooperatives themselves initiated this particular project. There are only 11 of them, and they have been loosely organized in the Ethiopian National Thrift and Credit Promotion Committee, with headquarters in Addis Ababa. Through Catholic Relief Services, the committee had secured funds to hire its first employee, a fieldman, whose responsibilities were to train the directors, treasurers, and committee members of these credit cooperatives.

Last spring the committee asked Volunteer Development Corps, headquartered here in Washington, to send an experienced volunteer to work with the committee's fieldman and to train him on-the-job in his responsibilities. VDC is funded partly with contributions from United States and overseas cooperatives and partly with a grant from AID. On the recommendation of Credit Union National Association and the World Council of Credit Unions, VDC asked Mr. O'Laughlin to volunteer his services to help the committee.

Mr. O'Laughlin is ideally qualified for this assignment. He holds a bachelor of science degree in business administration from St. Mary's College near Oakland (1963) and a master of science degree in business administration from Golden Gate College in San Francisco (1971). As a Peace Corps volunteer in Ghana in 1967-70, he had helped organize credit unions and a national credit union federation. Afterward, the World Council of Credit Unions asked him to help reorganize two large community credit unions in Liberia, and following his return to the United States, under the direction of California Credit Union League, Mr. O'Laughlin organized credit unions among low-income families in the San Francisco Bay area.

I understand that CUNA granted Mr. O'Laughlin leave with pay, and that as a VDC volunteer he went to Ethiopia in August to train the committee's first employee and to help the committee standardize accounting and other forms. VDC provided his travel to Ethiopia, his lodging, meals, and clothing care. The committee provided his travel within the country, a place to work, and secretarial assistance.

VDC had originally intended he stay 3 months. Indeed, VDC asks none of its volunteers to serve a longer assignment. However, I am advised that before these 3 months were up, the committee asked Mr. O'Laughlin to stay 2 months more: first, to organize and conduct a training seminar for leaders of potential, as well as existing, credit coopera-tives and second, to help organize a permanent, dues-paying league of Ethiopian credit unions that can take its place in the African confederation of thrift and credit societies and in the World Council of Credit Unions. He agreed. In his 5 months of volunteer service, Mr. O'Laughlin feels that he saw these objectives achieved.

As a result of the seminar, Mr. O'Laughlin told me, the Ethiopians understand that they have the knowledge and skill to operate their own credit and thrift societies and that they can generate through the savings of even their very poor members most of the loanable funds these societies require.

Mr. President, I draw certain conclusions from Mr. O'Laughlin's experience that may be useful in our continuing evaluation of the Agency for International Development and its annual appropriations.

First, both in title V and title IX of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, Congress has directed the Agency to use cooperatives as a means of assuring maximum participation of the people of the developing countries in their own economic development. My constituent's assignment in Ethiopia indicates that the Agency is carrying out the policy of Congress.

Second, I am glad to see the Agency grant funds to an organization like Volunteer Development Corps that encourages U.S. citizens to volunteer their talents and experience to help people of the lesser developed countries move forward economically. The volunteer spirit has contributed tremendously to America's development—in our schools, in our churches, in our communities, in our politics, in our cooperatives and credit unions, and in many other organized aspects of our daily life. This volunteer spirit is a foundation of our greatness as a nation, and I am glad AID encourages it.

Third, my constituent's experience indicates that the Agency's funding of direct, cooperative-to-cooperative assistance is a wise and effective use of its resources. A private organization in Ethiopia requested help of a private organization in the United States, and the U.S. organization provided it. Neither our Government nor the Ethiopian Government was involved, except as Mr. O'Laughlin and the committee chose to involve them. Congress knows the Ethiopians wanted this help, because they asked for it and because they committed certain resources. It was not something foisted upon them, not something provided because an official in Addis Ababa or Washington felt these people ought to have it.

Fourth, by using organizations such as Volunteer Development Corps, the Agency can maximize the usefulness of its appropriated dollars. For United States and overseas cooperatives contribute substantially to VDC's administrative costs. U.S. cooperative technicians volunteer their services, either as retirees or as employees on leave with pay. The overseas cooperative itself must provide some services. And VDC's sponsoring organizations contribute the time and talents of their top officials to VDC's administration.

These sponsoring organizations include Agricultural Cooperative Development International of Washington, D.C., American Institute of Cooperation of Washington, D.C., Credit Union National Association of Madison, Wis., Foundation for Cooperative Housing of Washington, D.C., League Insurance Group of Detroit, National Council of Farmer Cooperatives of Washington, D.C., and National Rural Electric Cooperative Association of Washington, D.C.

I commend to my colleagues the experience of my constituent, Mr. O'Laughlin. It indicates at least one of the directions we should move if our annual appropriations for overseas development are to be increasingly useful and effective.

THE PEACE CORPS

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, as a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, I fully support our recommendation for an appropriation of $77.2 million to finance Peace Corps operations for this fiscal year. This is the full amount authorized earlier by the Senate and the minimum needed in my judgment to sustain and support this operation at this time.

I strongly urge each of my colleagues to join in support of this modest, but vitally needed, appropriation.

At this point in the fiscal year, any lesser amount would require the Peace Corps to begin immediately calling back large numbers of volunteers working overseas and to withdraw its participation in programs it has pledged to support in several countries.

Already the Peace Corps has taken drastic steps to comply with the temporary spending authorization imposed by the Congress last month: including suspending any further invitations to the increasing number of Americans wishing to join the Peace Corps. And this had to be done at a time when applications are running 40 percent higher than a year ago; higher, in fact, than at any other time in the past 5 years.

We again see a paradox in the sense of priorities of some who would deprive a program that has long since proven its value and that enjoys wide public support, of the relatively small amount of money it needs to operate effectively. Not only do we remove a measure of hope which the Peace Corps represents to the people of developing countries, but we also deny an opportunity to serve in a practical manner to the many idealistic Americans of all ages and backgrounds who desire this opportunity.

From my own State of Illinois, alone, there are now 443 men and women serving in such countries as Fiji, Tunisia, India, Malaysia, and Liberia, helping the people of these countries to improve their schools, increase their agricultural production, reduce disease, and generally build the basis for a more peaceful world society. Their work is vital—not only to the people of those countries—who see the volunteer as representing the concerns of all Americans for the betterment of their lives—but equally to the individual volunteer who finds purpose in helping others. It is significant to note that the most recent sampling of public opinion concerning the Peace Corps showed that 93 percent of Americans feel that volunteers become "more useful citizens" as a result of their service.

Probably no Member of the Senate has visited more Peace Corps volunteers in the field over the past decade than I, having been privileged to study Peace Corps volunteers at work in many countries of Latin America, Asia, and Africa. I can personally vouch for their devotion and energy under conditions of severe hardship. They ask but little and they receive but little; but they give of themselves a great deal. Teaching and working, many times in remote inaccessible villages; many times they are out of contact with developed civilization for months on end.

But these dedicated volunteers will return to our country with a far better understanding of the world in which we live and will be far better equipped to contribute constructively to our own country.

I know of no better investment that we can make abroad. I hope that my colleagues will join with me in a strong vote of confidence for one of the finest overseas efforts that our country has ever undertaken.

Mr. TUNNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some remarks prepared for delivery by my colleague from California, with three editorials which he asks to have included with his remarks.

There being no objection, the statement and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR CRANSTON

Mr. President, I know this body is aware, the Peace Corps is one of America's finest contributions to international understanding and goodwill. I myself had the privilege of being associated with the Peace Corps as an evaluator in November, 1965. It would be tragic if, as a result of Congressional logjams over Foreign Assistance Act funding, the Peace Corps were to have no alternative except to bring home half its 8,000 volunteers and shut down its operations in 15 countries.

That, however, might very well be the unfortunate consequence if the Peace Corps were to receive an appropriation of $72 million, the annual rate at which it is currently authorized to spend under the continuing resolution. That must not be allowed to happen.

I do not mean to take issue with the Foreign Relations Committee action which led to the reduction of the Peace Corps' FY 1972 appropriation of $5 million less than was requested by the administration. I have the greatest respect for Chairman Fulbright, and I know that he and the Committee very carefully studied the Peace Corps program and its ability to economize before recommending the reduced authorization figure. However, the Peace Corps is confronted with the virtually impossible task of attempting in the last half of this fiscal year to make up for a cut of some $10 million from the basic level of spending under which it was operating—quite properly—for the bulk of the first half of this fiscal year. To achieve such an enormous net annual reduction would force something like an across-the-board 25% slash in spending in the last half of this fiscal year—one month of which is already past.

It is not the fault of the volunteers serving overseas and the host countries which they are serving that the Congress has been so delinquent in passing the Foreign Assistance Appropriations Act. Yet, it is exactly those volunteers and the host country nationals with whom they serve that will be sorely penalized if anything less than the full authorization is appropriated for the Peace Corps. Programs have been planned and promised, host country decisions have been made in reliance on those plans and promises, and volunteers have unselfishly dedicated a portion of their lives—and, in some instances, health and safety—to carry out these programs and meet our international commitments.

It would be a foolhardy economy effort to reduce Peace Corps funds by a few million dollars at the very real risk of purchasing international bad will of an incalculable dollar value. Everything possible must be done to prevent reduction of the appropriation below $77.5 million.

California continues to lead the nation in the number of its citizens, young and old, who have joined the Peace Corps to lend their talents and skills to the people of developing countries. At present, 1,214 of the Peace Corps volunteers and trainees are Californians. That is 15 percent of the world-wide total. California has contributed by far the largest number of volunteers from any one state—as has been the case throughout the Peace Corps' history. Since the Peace Corps was founded in 1961, more than 8,000 Californians have served as volunteers.

Across the nation, as in California, Americans who want to help others are turning to the Peace Corps. Applications are at a five-year high. It would be folly for us now to close the door on those who wish to serve, and to deny their aid to the nations that seek their help.

Therefore, I congratulate the Appropriations Committee for its full funding recommendation of $77.2 million and urge the Senate to approve the full amount. Then it is absolutely essential that the Senate conferees hold firm to the full $77.2 million figure as the expression of the Senate's high regard and strong commitment to the Peace Corps.

[Editorial from the San Jose Mercury, Jan. 13, 1972]

PEACE CORPS IS WORTH SAVING

Congressional wrangling over funding for the Peace Corps has just about put that agency out of business. It would be a disservice to America—and the world—to let the Peace Corps die.

However, unless a House-Senate conference committee can agree on a $77.2 million budget for the agency within a few weeks, the Peace Corps will begin terminating 4,000 of its 8,000 volunteers. Programs may be cancelled in as many as 15 underdeveloped nations.

The Peace Corps was one of the brighter products of a generally dismal decade, the Sixties. It would be too bad if the Peace Corps were to be allowed to die just as the Seventies are getting under way.

[Editorial from the Press-Telegram, Long Beach, Calif., Jan. 14, 1972]

AN UNWISE ECONOMY

Congress has so far refused to give the Peace Corps the $82-million appropriation requested by President Nixon.

As a result, the corps is planning to recall 4,000 of its 8,000 volunteers and to cancel programs in as many as 15 countries. Applicants for Peace Corps service are still being accepted, but no new volunteers will be signed up before July 1 unless Congress acts to restore funds for the agency.

Few American government efforts abroad have met with anything like the success of the Peace Corps. Under Democrats and Republicans alike, it has proved the United States to be a good neighbor around the world.

It would be tragic if the Peace Corps were to become the victim of quarrels in Congress over foreign aid. The House of Representatives appropriated only $68 million for the corps, although both houses had passed an authorization bill setting the level of Peace Corps financing at $77.2 million. In the last hour before it adjourned, Congress passed a resolution to give the Peace Corps a budget of $72 million.

That budget level is not adequate to sustain present corps activities. Joseph H. Blatchford, director of ACTION, the agency that oversees the Peace Corps, says the planned cuts will have to take effect unless Congress appropriates at least the full $77.2 million it had earlier approved.

Congress should do at least that. The corps has little more than half of the number of volunteers it had during its peak years in the 1960's. Rather than let it fall victim to a new isolationism, Congress should provide funds and encouragement for the Peace Corps to continue and expand.

[Editorial from the Los Angeles Times, Jan. 20, 1972]

PEACE CORPS FUNDING

The Peace Corps was not the least casualty of the congressional assault on the foreign aid bill late last year. President Nixon had asked $82 million to continue and expand the work of the overseas agency. The Senate authorized, but did not appropriate, $77.2 million. The House voted only $68 million. A final figure has yet to be decided by a conference committee. Meanwhile, uncertainty over how well it will be funded has forced the corps to halt all new recruitment and prepare plans for dropping half of its 8,000 members.

Such an action would be a misfortune for the United States, as most members of Congress agree. The Peace Corps continues to get good marks in both the House and Senate. The problem is that its budget became a victim of the anger, frustration and confusion which marked the general attack on foreign aid funds. Ironically, the threat to the Peace Corps comes at a time when an increasing number of persons are eager to serve in it, and when its popularity in foreign lands seems especially high.

The Peace Corps is too valuable an instrument of American foreign policy to be downgraded. Congress should assure it adequate funding through support for the Senate's $77.2 million authorization, and soon enough so that the drastic cutbacks threatened by delay can be cancelled.

[Appendix I]

PEACE CORPS OUTLINE OF "BUDGET CRISIS" FACTS

I. Why a "crisis": Peace Corps' current budget situation constitutes a genuine "crisis" for three major reasons:

1. The slow pace of Congressional appropriation action. We are now in the 7th month of the fiscal year. Peace Corps does not have an appropriation. The sequence of Congressional actions—and Peace Corps' response to the needs established by each step—were as follows:

The President's June 1971 amended FY 1972 budget request to Congress—$82.2 million—was the level of spending authorized by Congress in July, via a "continuing resolution."

Peace Corps spending in the first quarter of the fiscal year was, correctly, at this $82.2 million rate ($20.5 million).

Last October Congress approved a new, lower spending "authorization" at $77.2 million for the FY.

Peace Corps quickly and rigorously cut spending rates. Heavy reductions were made in staff, operating budgets world-wide were cut to barest operating minimums.

However, the 2nd quarter (Oct., Nov., Dec.) spending rate did not reflect savings from these decisions. This is because Peace Corps' budget is a "people" budget (no large grants made; no heavy spending for large equipment, etc.). There is a necessary time lag between the announcement of personnel reductions and the departure of personnel/actual cost savings.

In December, Congress set a still lower temporary annual spending rate for Peace Corps, of $72.0 million via still another "continuing resolution." This was apparently the result of a temporary compromise between the House appropriation figure passed at $68.0 million, and the $77.2 million authorization figure.

2. The "magnificent effect" of a reduction in annual budget, which occurs if all of the reduction must be taken during the last few months of the year.

As an example of this principle, a 10% reduction in annual budget has the effect of a 40% reduction in operation, if the whole amount must be taken in the last quarter.

Similarly, let us suppose that Peace Corps appropriation for FY '72 is passed at a low level of $72.0 million. This would be a 12% reduction from the President's June '71 request for $82.2 million, on an annualized basis. However, the reductions required in the last three months of the year (fiscal year) to come in at $72.0 million would mean a 37% reduction in operations during those months.

Thus, even though Peace Corps had acted dutifully in response to each prior cut, it would face the need to concentrate all of any further cut into a short end-of-the-year period, with consequent profound difficulty.

3. The absence of "Fat" in Peace Corps now. The fall, 1971 reductions trimmed Peace Corps "admin" capacities to the irreducible minimum.

The only remaining way to save money is by cutting overseas programs. This means disrupting ongoing programs in overseas countries, by bringing volunteers home in the middle of their tours of duty, just when their effectiveness is beginning to peak.

II. How the Crisis can be Resolved: The necessary steps are:

(1) When the Congress reconvenes, the Senate must appropriate at the $77.2 million level; and

(2) In the House-Senate conference, the Senate must sustain its $77.2 million position.

The danger is that some sort of compromise might be accepted by the Senate Conferees, between the Senate (potential) $77.2, and the House appropriation figure of $68.0. If such compromise were to occur, Peace Corps programs would be the victim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending business remain the pending business until disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I would like to have a short colloquy with the Senator from Wisconsin to clarify the effect of the item of $125 million for population programs which appears on page 2, lines 22 through 24.

This is the first time that there has been a separate appropriation item for population programs. In the past this work has been financed through the earmarking of funds from, primarily, the loan and technical assistance programs. The authorization bill for fiscal 1972 earmarks $125 million for that purpose, the same as the individual appropriation item in this bill. But the House appropriation bill contained only $50 million for this item and, in the normal course of events, the conferees will probably agree on an amount somewhere in between.

Yet, in my opinion, the language in the authorization act will still control. It reads: "Of the funds provided to carry out the provision of part I," of the Foreign Assistance Act, "for each of the fiscal years 1972 and 1973, $125,000,000 shall be available in each such fiscal year only to carry out the purposes of this title," meaning the title authorizing population control programs. The Foreign Relations Committee wanted to insure that at least this sum would be devoted to the population problem.

Does the Senator agree that this language in the authorization act is still controlling and that, regardless of the amount of the appropriation item that is finally agreed to in conference, a total of $125 million must be used by AID for population activities in this fiscal year?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has already used 2 minutes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield the Senator 2 additional minutes.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that the intention of the Appropriations Committee in providing $125 million for population control was that that amount should be available for population control exclusively. As the Senator points out, there is only $50 million for this item in the House bill. But regardless of how the conferees compromise on this amount the full $125 million will be available for population control, because of the controlling language in the authorization bill. If necessary, it would have to be taken from other funds, but it would certainly be available, and for population control.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator. That was my understanding, and I appreciate that clarification.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a current military assistance program table, with those few items which have been classified deleted, simply to illustrate the extent of our continued support of military regimes in so many different countries.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will someone yield me 5 minutes in opposition to the bill?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I yield the Senator 5 minutes on the bill.

Mr. ERVIN. When I had the privilege of being a student at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, I sat at the feet of a very wise professor of geology, Collier Cobb, who remarked on occasion that wise men learn by the experience of others and fools learn by their own experience, but the majority of mankind learn neither by the experience of others nor by their own.

I would have to say that those who have created and managed the fiscal policies of the United States during late years certainly fall into this third category. Shakespeare warned us through one of the characters in Hamlet:

Neither a borrower nor a lender be, for borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry, and loan oft loses both itself and friend.

Our country has lost many loans and friends in scattering the patrimony of our people among 125 foreign nations. Those who administer our financial affairs do not seem able to understand, despite our said experience in this respect, that "loan oft loses both itself and friend." We have spent approximately $140 billion as the principal in foreign aid programs. Since virtually every penny of this money was obtained by deficit financing, the cost of our foreign aid program in interest on the money we have obtained by this deficit financing has run to more than $100 billion additional.

In other words, the United States has persistently borrowed money to give it away and the end of this folly is not in sight. If an individual were to borrow money to give it away, his family and his friends would institute an inquisition in lunacy and procure the appointment of a guardian to manage his affairs. But if an American politician advocates borrowing money to give it away, he is likely to be elected President, or Senator or Member of the House of Representatives. If he does not attain any of these offices, he is almost certain to become Secretary of State.

I rise to make these remarks and to express the hope that sometime the United States will regain a small amount of fiscal sanity and exercise a small amount of fiscal responsibility. I must confess, however, that this hope is rather forlorn. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield for a question?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am happy to yield. Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Would the Senator from Wisconsin tell the Senate the total amount of the bill upon which the Senate will now vote, as amended by the Senate?

Mr. PROXMIRE. As amended by the Senate, the total amount would be $3,073,635,000.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. If the Senator will yield me 1 minute, I will point out—

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. That that is more than the authorization bill of $2,914,870,000 that the Senate voted down on October 29. Although the items are somewhat different, the total dollar figure in today's appropriation bill is $159 million greater than the total dollar figure which the Senate voted down on October 29, 1971.

Mr. President, it seems to me, in determining our generosity to foreign countries, that we must have in mind our own financial situation at home. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a table showing our financial situation.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do the Senators yield back the remainder of their time?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WEICKER). All remaining time having expired or yielded back, and the bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. BROCK (after having voted in the negative). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Texas (Mr. Tower). If he were present and voting, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay." I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. LONG (after having voted in the affirmative). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE). If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea." I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. INOUE (after voting in the affirmative). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Georgia (Mr. GAMBRELL). If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea." I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. I announce that the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL), the Senator from Iowa (Mr. HUGHES), the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON), the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. JORDAN), the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. McCLELLAN), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. McGOVERN), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. McINTYRE), the Senator from Utah (Mr. MOSS), the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE), the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH), the Senator from Georgia (Mr. GAMBRELL), and the Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE), are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. McGEE), and the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) are absent because of official business.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON) would vote "yea."

On this vote, the Senator from Washington (Mr. JACKSON) is paired with the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. JORDAN).

If present and voting, the Senator from Washington would vote "yea" and the Senator from North Carolina would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Iowa (Mr. HUGHES) is paired with the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH).

If present and voting, the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea" and the Senator from West Virginia would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. McGOVERN) is paired with the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. McCLELLAN).

If present and voting, the Senator from South Dakota would vote "yea" and the Senator from Arkansas would vote "nay."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ALLOTT), the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BELLMON), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. COTTON), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN), the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. HRUSKA), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. JORDAN), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. SAXBE), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. TAFT), the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) is absent because of illness.

If present and voting, the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. HRUSKA) would vote "nay."

The pair of the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) has been previously announced.

On this vote, the Senator from Colorado (Mr. ALLOTT), is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. COTTON). If present and voting, the Senator from Colorado would vote "yea" and the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Ohio (Mr. TAFT) is paired with the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN). If present and voting, the Senator from Ohio would vote "yea" and the Senator from Wyoming would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 23, as follows:

So the bill (H.R. 12067) was passed.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and request a conference with the House of Representatives thereon, and that the Chair be authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer (Mr. WEICKER) appointed Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. McGEE, Mr. ELLENDER, Mr. McCLELLAN, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. FONG, Mr. BROOKE, and Mr. YOUNG conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXTENSION OF DATE FOR TRANSMISSION OF A COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I send a joint resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration. It has been cleared on both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, may we have order in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please come to order. Senators not participating in this discussion will please take their seats or retire to the cloakroom.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, with all respect, would the Chair withhold his ruling?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling is withheld.

Mr. JAVITS. I wish to state that it was understood the EEOC bill would immediately follow the measure which has just been passed. I have no objection whatever to this joint resolution, but I wish to preserve our rights respecting the bill.

I will not object, but I wish to note that I understood the EEOC bill would be taken up immediately following adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York will yield, I wish to corroborate what he has just said. He has been very diligent all day in making certain that this would be the case, and I want to assure him that once this joint resolution is passed, we will return to the pending bill.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, let me say that I only asked that we take up this resolution now because I knew it would take only a couple of minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 196), which was read the first time by title and the second time at length.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is open to amendment.

If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

S.J. RES. 196

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the joint resolution entitled "Joint Resolution extending the dates for transmission of the Economic Report and the report of the Joint Economic Committee", approved December 22, 1971 (Public Law 92-216; 85 Stat. 778), is amended by striking out "March 10, 1972" and by inserting in lieu thereof "March 28, 1972".

EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 1971

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair now lays before the Senate the unfinished business which the clerk will state.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

S. 2515, to further promote equal employment opportunities for American workers.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina kindly withhold that request?

Mr. ERVIN. I withhold the request.

Mr. JAVITS. Just so I can make a short statement.

Mr. ERVIN. Of course.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the manager of the bill, the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS), and myself as the ranking member of both the committee and the subcommittee from this side, are engaged at the moment in hearing witnesses in opposition to the bill dealing with the west coast dock strike.

Having consulted with the leadership, I believe it is fair to say it was a duty which we have which is entitled to at least a few hours that it will take this afternoon. I understand that Members who wish to speak on the EEOC bill, of course, will be free to do so but I would also hope that the leadership would accommodate the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS) and myself so that there are no votes or other actions taken which would be materially related to the future of the bill.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, let me say that I am fully in accord with what the distinguished Senator from New York has just said. I realize that they have Harry Bridges and representatives of management before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare this afternoon. Those hearings have been interrupted twice already. There will be no further votes today and I want to assure the Senator that even though he and the chairman will be absent, their rights will be fully protected, but I do not anticipate any difficulties whatsoever. I might say that we expect to adjourn shortly anyway.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, may I state that there is no necessity at all for the distinguished Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS) asking that the majority leader protect his rights. He knows full well that no advantage will be taken of him.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I was sure of that but I thought we had to make sure about the pending business and I wanted the Record to be made clear on it.

DRUG EFFORT ADVANCED BY UNANIMOUS HOUSE VOTE

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, as chief sponsor of the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1971 it is a source of tremendous satisfaction to me and to the Senate cosponsors of S. 2097 to view the responsible and timely action taken yesterday by the House of Representatives in approving by a unanimous 380 to 0 vote, a companion bill to concentrate the resources of the Federal Government in an all-out effort against drug abuse and drug dependence.

In one of the truly remarkable examples of bipartisan cooperation, the Senate passed S. 2097 last December 2, hardly more than 5 months after its introduction, by a vote of 92 to 0.

That vote taken together with yesterday's House action confirms that there is not even a scintilla of opposition to the clear need to revamp the Federal drug effort for the purpose of controlling narcotics abuse in this Nation and assisting its victims to lead more meaningful lives outside of the oppression of addiction.

The measure that was approved by the House, while differing from the Senate bill in several respects, provides an excellent basis for conference action. As such, it is a tribute to the tireless efforts of Congressman PAUL ROGERS of Florida, chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Health and Environment of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. Indeed, all of the members of that subcommittee deserve especial praise from this chamber, including, of course, Congressman ANCHER NELSEN of Minnesota, the distinguished ranking minority member of the subcommittee, whose intensive work in this field is well known to all of us. Congressman HARLEY O. STAGGERS of West Virginia, chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, and my good friend WILLIAM L. SPRINGER, its ranking minority member, are also to be commended for expediting full committee action on this critical legislation, characterized by the President himself as "emergency legislation."

As with the respective Senate committees involved, Chairman ROGERS' subcommittee held numerous days of hearings and journeyed far and wide to ascertain the extent of the drug problem and what most needs to be done to counteract it. I think it more than coincidental that in certain fundamental respects our analyses of the problem and the legislative formulas we have arrived at to address the problem are markedly similar. The basic difference, I would say, involves the extent of new Federal moneys that are needed in this effort—the Senate having proposed $1.8 billion over 4 years and the House $413 million over 3 years.

I do not mean to minimize the importance I attach to the authorization for these funds, but I am confident that when we compare notes in committee, we will be able to satisfactorily resolve this issue.

Several other omissions in the House bill that I personally regard as especially significant include the following:

First, a provision by which the President is directed to prepare a comprehensive national drug abuse strategy that encompasses both effective law enforcement against illegal drug traffic and effective health programs to rehabilitate the victims of drug abuse. The strategy is to be developed through the establishment of a high-level strategy council consisting of the Director of the Special Action Office, the Attorney General, the Secretaries of Health, Education, and Welfare, State, and Defense, the VA Administrator, and such other officials as the President may designate. The Director of the Special Action Office would be authorized to provide whatever services are required in the preparation of such strategy. Thus, in that capacity, the Director would have a key role in pulling together the information, reports, studies, and evaluations which will form the basis of the Council's deliberations;

Second, a provision by which the Director of the Special Action Office would assist the Veterans' Administration in assuring that all veterans receive treatment and rehabilitation services for drug abuse without regard for the nature of their discharge and without regard to whether their drug dependency was service connected. Such services would include inpatient and outpatient care irrespective of any prior inpatient treatment, psychiatric care, counseling, vocational training, or other rehabilitation services, and the funding, setting up, or operation of residential halfway houses;

Third, a provision by which the Director of the Special Action Office shall consult with and be consulted by the Attorney General in the scheduling of drugs under the Comprehensive Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Act of 1970; and Fourth, the establishment of a National Institute for Drug Abuse within the National Institute of Mental Health of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

The need for a strategy council, to which I referred above, is highlighted by an outstanding account by Stuart Auerbach appearing in the Washington Post of January 28, 1972, and entitled "Pot Plan Gets a Bad Trip." The article documents the self-defeating, bureaucratic discombobulation which has resulted from the absence of a clear national policy on research and experiments involving marihuana, heretofore classified as a dangerous drug under the Controlled Substances Act of 1970. We are indebted to Mr. Auerbach for his investigative skill in digging out this story, and I ask unanimous consent that the article be reprinted in the Record, following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. (See exhibit 1.)

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that an excellent article by Peter Osnos reporting from Saigon, appearing in the Washington Post of February 2, 1972, entitled "Progress Seen in Drive to Curb GI Drug Use in Vietnam," be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. (See exhibit 2.)

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, particularly disturbing in his account is the observation that there has been a large-scale drop in the number of servicemen who have voluntarily turned themselves in to Army officials for treatment. Osnos attributes this to:

... the belief that there is nothing to be gained any more by doing so since the notation made on the permanent medical record is the same as if one were caught. Under a previous amnesty procedure, no record was kept at all. That was quietly changed last August. Medical records are supposed to be confidential but soldiers fear they will be used against them should they ever apply for a government job or seek a security clearance. There seems to be good reason for the fear. Senior officers conceded that there might well be circumstances in which the substance of a medical record would be released to outside government agencies, including the FBI.

If Mr. Osnos is correct in his observations, then I think we have real reason to be concerned. I therefore intend to ask Dr. Jaffe, presently serving as Director of the Special Action Office pursuant to Executive order, to report to me on this matter.

Again, I congratulate Chairman ROGERS and his subcommittee and look forward to prompt action by the conferees on these two bills in order that the Federal drug program can be re-oriented and made more effective. If we are able to deal with this parasitic dependency of illicit drugs that is afflicting our cities and suburban rural areas, that is nurturing crime, that is gnawing at individual and societal well being, that is preying upon our youth, that is ravaging our educational and military institutions and that is inflicting immeasurable pain and hardship on families and communities across the country—then we will have performed an invaluable service to this Nation.

Mr. President, I should like to add that from my own deep personal feeling about this matter, I do happen to know that in the tragedy that occurred in our own family, there was some evidence that it was drug addiction that caused the perpetrator of the crime to seek additional revenue.

I also have received evidence in the past few weeks in my own State of the way in which this tragedy reaches different families. The vice president of a Chicago company had a son who came back from Vietnam on drugs. Through special effort extended by David Packard, we found this young man who had left the service and was lost to his family and friends and community as a whole. He was found, taken back into a veterans' rehabilitation program. His dishonorable discharge has been reversed. As a result of the rehabilitation that has taken place, he is not only back in college, but has also assumed a part-time job and has been saved as an individual. All of this has transpired within a few months, ever since the Defense Department started treating this as an illness rather than a crime. That is the happy story.

The sad one is that in Henry County, Ill., a few weeks ago, I talked with a father who had just buried his son, a 19-year-old boy who was on marihuana and who had taken with that marihuana a hard drug that proved lethal within 24 hours.

It is hard to realize that this tragedy has spread from the city into the suburbs and is directly responsible for a dramatic increase in crime in the suburbs, particularly in the city of Chicago with which I am familiar.

Mr. President, this does not affect only those on drugs or those who are tempted to go on drugs or experiment with drugs, but it also affects everyone in the country concerned with the dramatic increases in crime, 50 to 75 percent of which is in the area of street crime involving mugging, robbery, and larceny or whatever it may be. It is directly related to drug abuse.

It is with great satisfaction that I can say that we have seen the problem, worked cooperatively with the administration and in record time will send to the President for his signature a bill that has passed both House and Senate. I am confident that in conference the differences can be quickly resolved.

POT PLAN GETS A BAD TRIP

(By Stuart Auerbach)

Dr. Nathan S. Kline was brainstorming one day last year about ways to help some of his severely depressed patients.

Marijuana, he thought, might be just the thing to fill the gap between the time a depressed patient begins treatment and the time drugs in current use take effect—generally two to three weeks. During that time, the severely depressed patient runs a great risk of committing suicide.

"I have a clinical intuition that marijuana might be useful," Kline said recently. It was this same kind of "clinical intuition" that led to his pioneering research 20 years ago in the development of tranquilizers.

Kline thought that a very small dose ("not even enough for a good pot party") of tetrahydrocannabinol (THC), the active ingredient in marijuana, would be enough to help his patients.

Last July he wrote the Food and Drug Administration for permission to use THC in a limited clinical trial—on 10 patients, over 21 years of age and excluding women of childbearing age.

He was told to supply more information about his proposed test to a joint committee of the FDA and the National Institute of Mental Health. And he was told he needed a license from the Justice Department's Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs to use marijuana before he could get the FDA's approval.

Kline, who is a psychiatrist and pharmacologist, had no doubts about getting approval. Indeed, in 1970 at the request of NIMH he had carried 1,600 grams of marijuana and 12.11 grams of hashish into the United States from Nepal.

To do that he needed the approval of the BNDD, which he received in sextuplet. When U.S. Customs asked Kline if he had anything to declare, he replied, "Yes, 1,600 grams of marijuana and 12.11 grams of hashish."

The BNDD agents had faith in Kline this time too. Their inspection of his New York City office showed that the locked cabinet he uses to store drugs is strong enough to protect the marijuana from theft.

But they said he needed an OK from the state Narcotics Commission before they could give him the approval that the FDA required before letting him go ahead with his clinical trials.

That was a little harder. The state narcotics agents said Kline needs a 900-pound specially built safe to hold the THC. So he spent $450 and bought the safe.

The state agents told him one more thing—they could give their approval for him to keep marijuana until he had the FDA's license to run the experiment.

"That," he said, "puts me back at the beginning of the circle."

The FDA won't give its approval without an OK from the BNDD. The BNDD won't say yes without the approval of the state Narcotics Commission. And the State Narcotics Commission requires FDA approval before it will say yes.

There is one possible way out. The joint FDA-NIMH committee on medical experiments with mind-altering drugs will be meeting and it could give its approval to Kline's proposal.

But the committee's next meeting is in November.

"It's stupid," said Kline.

"One of the most important scientific questions we have to answer at this time is whether THC is or is not dangerous, and whether there are or are not side effects from it, and whether it has any clinical applications."

"How we are ever going to find out in this lifetime is beyond me," he said.

PROGRESS SEEN IN DRIVE TO CURB GI DRUG USE IN VIETNAM

(By Peter Osnos)

SAIGON, February 1.—The Army's drive to curb the heroin epidemic among GIs in South Vietnam, a job considered by many commanders as important as battling the Vietcong, has made some progress since it began last spring.

But at the same time, officers acknowledge that there are major problems still remaining that may only be solved when the last GIs board the plane for home.

On the positive side, the Army's greatest strides have been in overcoming the confusion about what needed to be done that prevailed at the time the drug crisis here began to be reported in Congress and the media last year.

Over the months, a reasonably systematic program of education, identification and treatment has evolved. As it is now, a GI should have a pretty good idea of what can happen to him if he uses heroin and where he can turn if he wants to stop.

As for the problems, the biggest is that high-quality and low-priced heroin continues to be plentiful on or very near most U.S. installations. Any GI who wants heroin, it is generally agreed, can still get it.

In the Mekong Delta city of Cantho, for example, the two most notorious drug establishments—"Fat Mama's" and "Shabazz"—are still thriving despite countless raids by American MPs and Vietnamese police.

"We hit them one day," said Maj. Kenneth J. Toso, the drug officer for the 9,000 U.S. troops still in the delta, "and the next day they're back in business."

The proprietors, it is said, have family connections with the local police.

Vietnamese authorities insist they have tightened up considerably on drug smuggling, but it evidently has not been enough. "Let's face it," one American observed, "they just don't care as much about it as we do."

This easy access to heroin accounts for the fact that the number of users among younger enlisted men remains dismally high.

especially in rear area support units where the epidemic has always been most severe.

Statistics released by the Pentagon show the overall rate of heroin use declining to somewhere between 5 per cent and 2.5 per cent, depending on the criteria used. But the percentages are misleading because they apply to everyone—majors and master sergeants as well as privates.

Among the lowest ranking and youngest GIs (whose numbers are diminishing rapidly in Vietnam) the rate of heroin use has dropped, according to drug experts, from a peak of perhaps 20-25 per cent to about 15 per cent.

Not all of these are addicts, by any means, and the number of users dips very significantly as the date approaches for the men to go home.

"Heroin is not part of the Vietnam experience they want to take home with them," said one young drug counselor.

But among those GIs staying behind, it is more difficult, officers have found, to get them to stay off drugs. Just as in the United States, drug specialists in Vietnam have discovered that physical withdrawal is only the first and easiest part of helping addicts.

"The best we're able to do is get the heroin itself out of their system and maybe get them pointed in the right direction," said Capt. James A. Walley, who runs a treatment center at Binhthuy in the Delta. "We're not kidding ourselves."

When it comes to dealing with repeaters, the army still hasn't figured out exactly what to do. The worst of the lot, over 100 soldiers a month, are simply processed out of the service as undesirables.

Although the army makes certain that the men are not using heroin the day they are actually returned to civilian life, the very fact that they have been kicked out means they are not rehabilitated and run a high risk of immediately starting up again.

In President Nixon's message to Congress declaring a "war on heroin" last June, he said the legislators would be asked to authorize the military "to retain for treatment any individual due for discharge who is a narcotics addict."

"All our servicemen," the President said, "must be accorded the right to rehabilitation."

The Pentagon has drafted and presented the legislation, but in the meantime, those drug users the army decides for one reason or another it can't help, it doesn't.

In bringing the present order to the Army's approach to the drug problems, by far the most important innovation appears to have been the urine test which made it vastly more difficult to take heroin without getting caught.

The tests have served first to identify heroin users so they can be dealt with and second as a deterrent to starting in the first place. The urinalysis machines have proven usually reliable and no method, short of going off drugs for a period of several days, has been found for getting around them.

At first, the tests were administered only as GIs were leaving Vietnam, but the program has been gradually extended so that every unit is now tested, randomly and without warning, at least once every three months.

When a soldier tests positive he is promptly dispatched to one of two detoxification centers set up in June at the still-massive support bases in Longbinh and Camranh Bay. Together the facilities can handle about 300 people at a time, and both are said to operate at or over capacity.

While not actually stockades, the centers are tightly guarded. The time a soldier spends there "drying out" is added to his time in Vietnam and his pay for those days is forfeited. A notation of drug use is made on the GI's permanent medical record.

Soldiers twice identified as users whose disciplinary records are otherwise poor are sent to a high-security "drug abuser holding center" at Longbinh where procedures for getting them out of the Army take place.

Besides doctors and nurses, Longbinh and Camranh Bay have staff psychologists and counsellors. But, as is so often the case with crowded and busy public institutions, they have little time for individual problems in the four to six days each GI spends there.

Ideally, after detoxification, a soldier would be sent to one of the nine rehabilitation centers around the country for more counselling. In practice, this almost never happens and the men are just returned to their units.

The rehabilitation centers began to appear about a year ago with the first signs of trouble. They open and close and go through one reorganization after another like so many fly-by-night businesses. Quality and commitment vary widely.

The centers are smaller than the detoxification facilities and less punitive. The most ambitious keep their patients for two weeks and offer genuine counselling and recreation as well as health care. Time spent there is counted as part of a Vietnam tour.

Until recently, the only way to get into a rehabilitation center was to volunteer for what used to be called the amnesty program and now is called "exemption." Anyone picked up through urinalysis is ineligible.

Now, however, probably because the rehabilitation centers generally operate with fewer GIs than they can take, the decision whether to send a drug user to Longbinh, Camranh or a local center has been left up to the man's commander.

The drop in the number of GIs turning themselves in has been attributed to the belief that there is nothing to be gained any more by doing so since the notation made on the permanent medical record is the same as if one were caught.

Under a previous amnesty procedure, no record was kept at all. That was quietly changed last August. Medical records are supposed to be confidential, but soldiers fear they will be used against them should they ever apply for a government job or seek a security clearance.

There seems to be good reason for the fear. Senior officers conceded that there might well be circumstances in which the substance of a medical record would be released to outside government agencies, including the FBI.

The colonel added that heavy drug users are also likely to have bad administrative records (court martials for possession of heroin and so on) that would give them trouble even if there were no notations on their medical records.

Another innovation in the antidrug campaign unpopular with the GI is an eight-page, 96-item questionnaire that each man must fill out whether he turns himself in or is picked up in the urine test.

Maj. Toso in the delta said the forms, which bear the drug user's name, are used to provide valuable raw data on the drug problems and the kinds of people who become involved.

He said the forms are kept in Vietnam and are not, as many GIs believe, routinely turned over to the FBI.

The major, who had no experience in the drug field until he arrived in Vietnam last October, oversees the regional education program (visits to units from reformed addicts and specially trained Drug Education Field Teams) and works closely with the rehabilitation center in the Binhthuy Army Base hospital.

The center has 30 beds but last week only two GIs showed up and after a day, one dropped out.

The soldier said he wanted to be with his buddies at the Longbinh detoxification center, even though it would cost him time and money to be sent there. He was placed on the first available plane.

The previous week, seven GIs came. As of last Tuesday three had dropped out, one because the Army had abruptly cut short his tour and sent him home.

For the most part, an official at the center said, the men coming to the center are the ones getting close to the end of their stay in Vietnam and want to get straightened out before they leave.

"The biggest thing in their lives is going home," said one of the social workers at the center, "that's the medicine that works best."

QUORUM CALL

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO 10 A.M. MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1972

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in adjournment until 10 a.m. on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATORS CHURCH, FONG, RANDOLPH, MOSS, EAGLETON, HANSEN, GURNEY, AND PERCY ON MONDAY NEXT

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, immediately following the recognition of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee (Mr. Brock), the following Senators be recognized, each for not to exceed 15 minutes and in the following order: Messrs. Church, Fong, Randolph, Moss, Eagleton, Hansen, Gurney, and Percy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS ON MONDAY NEXT

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the unanimous-consent orders recognizing Senators on Monday next there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to exceed 30 minutes, with statements limited therein to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

QUORUM CALL

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, before making a motion to adjourn, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR LIMITATION OF DEBATE ON CERTAIN NOMINATIONS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that there be a limitation of 1 hour on each of the nominations appearing on the Executive Calendar—Calendar No. 1, Calendar No. 2, and Calendar No. 3—the time to be equally divided between the majority leader and the minority leader, or their designees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE PENDING QUESTION

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, what is the pending question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on agreeing to amendment No. 813, offered by the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. Ervin).

PROGRAM

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, on Monday the Senate will convene at 10 a.m. After the two leaders have been recognized under the standing order, the following Senators will be recognized, each for not to exceed 15 minutes, and in the order stated: Messrs. BROCK, CHURCH, FONG, RANDOLPH, MOSS, EAGLETON, HANSEN, GURNEY, and PERCY.

At the conclusion of the unanimous consent orders recognizing Senators there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to exceed 30 minutes, with statements limited therein to 3 minutes each.

At the conclusion of morning business, it is the intention of the distinguished majority leader to proceed with the consideration of three nominations; namely, the nomination of John Eugene Sheehan, of Kentucky, to be a member of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System; of George H. Boldt, of Washington, to be Chairman of the Pay Board; and of Mr. C. Jackson Grayson, Jr., of Texas, to be Chairman of the Price Commission.

There is a possibility of a rollcall vote on one of the nominations. I cannot be sure of that, but the majority leader thought it best to alert Senators to the possibility that there might be a rollcall vote on one of the nominations.

After the nominations have been considered and acted upon, the Senate will return to the consideration of the unfinished business. The pending question is on agreeing to amendment No. 813, offered by the able Senator from North Carolina (Mr. ERVIN).

Rollcall votes are possible at any time, and motions to table amendments may be made at any time and votes had thereon.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 10 A.M. ON MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1972

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate stand in adjournment until 10 a.m. on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3:28 p.m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 7, 1972, at 10 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 4, 1972:

U.S. ARMS CONTROL AND DISARMAMENT AGENCY

The following-named persons to be members of the General Advisory Committee of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency:

Robert Ellsworth, of Maryland, vice William J. Casey, resigned.

John A. McCone, of California, vice Cyrus R. Vance, resigned.

Earle Gilmore Wheeler, of West Virginia, vice Douglas Dillon, resigned.

David Packard, of California, vice Peter G. Peterson, resigned.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE COURT AS A SUPER LEGISLATURE

HON. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, February 4, 1972

Mr. BYRD of Virginia. Mr. President, the January 25 edition of the Miami Herald included an interesting and reflective article written by Mr. Perry Morgan, who is the editor of the Akron, Ohio, Beacon Journal. The article concerns the recent U.S. District Court decision that would order the merger of the school systems of Chesterfield and Henrico Counties, Va., with that of the city of Richmond.

This Ohio editor went directly to the heart of the matter when he wrote:

The court thus became, in a twinkling, not only a super school board but a super legislature.

I ask unanimous consent that the article, entitled "Judge-Made Law Threatens All," be printed in the Extensions of Remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUDGE-MADE LAW THREATENS ALL (By Perry Morgan)

Judicial activism seems to have reached its zenith in two lines of cases advancing toward the Supreme Court of the United States. If the court validates the reasoning in the cases, the principle of local control of education will be a thing of the past. Public schools, root and branch, will be remade according to judicial standards. The end result could be a national system of education.

The first line of cases arises from a quest for a school-by-school balance of races. In what New York Timesman Tom Wicker called a cataclysmic decision, a federal judge in Richmond has ordered the consolidation of three school districts because the defendant district had an insufficient number of blacks to produce a racial balance pleasing to the court.

The court thus became, in a twinkling, not only a super school board but a super legislature. It eradicated existing political subdivisions and ordered new ones created—changing tax rates, creating a new school board, and handling other details once thought to be the responsibility of the people acting through their elected representatives.

An educator quoted by The Wall Street Journal said: "The social and educational implications of the Richmond decision are overwhelming. Potentially, it could affect every American."

True, obviously. For the court in Richmond was not relying on a finding of official acts of discrimination or of discriminatory intent. It was saying that segregation North or South, whether the product of discrimination, circumstance, happenstance or free choice, must be ended and, with it, any local or state laws that permit it.

The court did not say this, as The Charlotte News had stated; "because the three school systems were designed for discriminatory or invidious or unconstitutional ends, but because court-ordered restructuring was an expedient way to achieve the goal of racial balance."

With an arrogance increasingly evident in the attitudes of some federal district courts, Judge Robert R. Merhige Jr. described his revolutionary mandate as a "strict constructionist" interpretation of the Constitution. The decision in truth, whatever its merits, is a radical expansion of judge-made law.

And that decision, like those from Texas and Minnesota voiding school financing methods in those states, invites the Supreme Court to preside over a revolution in American government.

The Texas and Minnesota decisions must be read as requiring a rough equity in the amount of dollars spent on each school child within a state. This means—instantly—more means of raising and distributing school monies.

But if it is unconstitutional to have disparities between districts within a state, it follows logically that no more may be spent on the education of a child in New York than on a child in Mississippi; thus, the next step is to push the power beyond the hands of the state and into the hands of the federal government.

The most disturbing element in these decisions is not that they are radical but that they may well be reckless and senseless as well. Judges are expert, more or less, on the law. They know little about education and seemingly care little about the delicate and complex blend of public attitudes and compromises by which public school systems are sustained by citizen interest and tax support.

Referring to the Texas decision on school financing, Harvard's Dr. Daniel P. Moynihan
